Wilder Considers Moving Up

By Jeffery Stinson

©Copyright 1991, USA TODAY/Apple College Information Network

RICHMOND, Va. — Two blocks from the Confederacy Museum in this capital city of the Old South, Virginia Gov. L. Douglas Wilder pounds his fist on his desk as he talks about racial quotas.

Wilder, the nation's first black elected governor and a likely 1992 Democratic presidential contender, thinks President Bush has hornsawed Democrats into debating a "phony issue" rather than the true merits of the civil rights bill pending in Congress.

The House would go on to pass a measure to expand the rights of women, religious minorities and the disabled to collect monetary damages in job-bias lawsuits. The bill does not contain provisions for job quotas.

"I didn't get to be governor of Virginia based on quotas," he said, his usually soft-spoken patrician drawl rising in pitch. "I know blacks certainly don't want quotas. Women don't want quotas. All they want (he pounds the desk again) is an opportunity to compete on a level playing field."

Such passion seldom issues from the silver-haired, gentlemanly "mainstream Democrat" who is said to have shed the fiery liberal label he wore in the state Senate in the early 1970s. In fact, he is praised by some conservatives these days.

In a recent interview, Wilder, 60, talked about issues ranging from a possible run for the White House to the United States' involvement in the Persian Gulf War.

QUESTION: You have set up an exploratory committee to look at running for the presidency. From what you have been able to ascertain so far, is George Bush beatable?

ANSWER: Yes.

Q: How so?

A: Domestic issues and a lack of a clear message for the American people of where we go from here. Having said that, however, the question is who does it? And what's the image of Democrats and how are they perceived?

There's no great support for anybody among Democrats for anybody in the country as I see and as the exploratory committee reports. There is concern about who speaks for the Democrats.

Q: Has your exploratory committee given you any indication of whether you're going to run?

A: If you left it to them, I know what they would say. They would say run. I've got to ask more objective people.

Q: If Virginia can elect a governor who is black, can the United States elect a president who is?

A: Oh yes, I don't think there is any question about it. I wouldn't think twice about answering that.

The question is whether that person would have an opportunity to appeal to the basic fairness in people. I think the vast majority of Americans are fair-minded, period, whatever color. There is a residue of racism. But it's small in comparison.

Q: Are you going to run?

A: I will give every consideration to what my exploratory committee says. And I will make a decision about that in midsummer, as to what I'm going to do.

Q: The perception is that Democrats can't be trusted in the White House — that they're somehow fiscally irresponsible.

A: Yeah, and that they will somehow damage you fiscally notwithstanding the last 10 years in which we've seen total irresponsibility. The eyes of the people will come to see that there's been a cruel hoax on the middle class and middle America. ... We saw the rich get richer and the poor get poorer in the last 10 years.

Who do you blame that on? Oh, you've got to blame somebody, so we'll blame it on that Congress. And the Congress, unfortunately, is not able to speak as monolithically as the president using the bully pulpit can.

Q: The Democratic Leadership Council has adopted your 1989 campaign theme of 'A New Mainstream.' What do you think of the DLC?

Crowe Speaks On Leaders At Graduation

UNCW News

UNCW awarded 1,215 degrees at its 42nd commencement exercises on May 11 in Trask Coliseum. Adding a special touch to the ceremonies was highland bagpiper Dorothy Dempsey who piped in the platform party.

In this graduating class, some 1,140 students received bachelor's degrees while 75 were awarded graduate degrees.

Speaker for the occasion was retired Admiral William J. Crowe, Jr., eleventh chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff who served two two-year terms under President Ronald Reagan. In remarks that were liberally sprinkled with quotes from Mark Twain, Abraham Lincoln, Paul Harvey, George Burns, Jane Bryant Quinn, and even a cab driver, Crowe urged the graduates throughout their lives to keep an open mind, have a sense of humor, and know the "greatest joy a human can know...the ecstasy of completing a job well done."

Commenting on the state of the world, Crowe observed, "To conclude because we have serious problems that we are going to the dogs is nonsense. Previous ages have faced more disease, racism, and poverty than your generation." The globe since its beginning has faced terrifying challenges, but it is still revolving on its axis.

He quoted Art Buchwald's comment, "I don't know if this is the best of times or the worst of times, but it's the only time we've got," and urged the class of 1991 to "direct your talents to improving our condition without moaning about our problems."

He told the graduates that to deal with the world's problems, their generation will require "extraordinary statesmen and leaders."

Explaining the difference between politicians and statesmen, he said, "Politicians make the possible necessary; statesmen make the necessary possible. One of our most urgent challenges is quality leadership. There's no dearth of sound ideas, but there is a scarcity of leaders who can translate thought into action."

He encouraged the graduates to be open to new ideas and "nourish the spirit of inquiry" as they go about their careers, cautioning against becoming what Jane Bryant Quinn called "prisoners of their vocabularies." Crowe said, "Your mind is like a parachute. It won't help you unless it opens at the right time."

Early in his talk, he made what was to be his only reference to military affairs and Operation Desert Storm. In remarks that drew enthusiastic applause, he said, "Today's American youngsters are just as courageous as their forebears. I've never been more proud of our troops than in the past several weeks."

He closed his remarks by offering "the best advice an ancient mariner can give: may you always have fair winds and following seas."

Following his talk, Crowe was awarded the Honorary Doctor of Laws, the highest accolade the institution can bestow upon an individual. Only 13 other individuals have received honorary degrees from UNCW.

During the commencement ceremonies, in addition to granting degrees, several special awards were presented. Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs William A. Bryan presented the Hoggard Medal to Second Lieutenant Craig Milburn Moore of Fayetteville, who earned a bachelor of arts degree in history in December 1990. The Hoggard Medal is presented annually to the graduating senior who, in the opinion of the faculty, has shown the most improvement during the student's career at UNCW.

Moore came to UNCW in the fall of 1986 with the goal to be the first in his family to earn a college degree. Unprepared for college life and facing many problems, he almost dropped out of college to join the army. Instead, he joined ROTC. With close monitoring from the History Department and the staff of the Military Science Department, he made Dean's List in 1988.

Also singled out was education graduate Elizabeth Curtis Brown of Castle Hayne who was presented the Alumni Association Scholar Achievement Award for having the highest grade in the graduating class.

Canoe Trip For Freshmen Only

There is a great opportunity for freshmen to get to know one another and explore the area. The Discover Outdoor and Leadership Centers are planning three canoe trips that are for freshmen only. These trips will be held September 14, 21, and 28. If you would like to take a canoe trip with us, come by The Leadership Center (University Union 212) or the Discover center (University Center 138), or call 395-3877.

UNCW Media Need You

The Seahawk, UNCW's student newspaper is looking for writers, photographers, sales people, and cartoonists. We offer a chance to get experience in many aspects of the journalistic field.

WLOZ, the campus radio station also needs good people to DJ and cover news. Apply today at The Seahawk in room 205 of the University Union, or at WLOZ in room 211.

Warning!

There has been an outbreak of unruly behavior at UNCW—particularly by 20 students who call themselves "Orientation Leaders." Beware of these characters. They are rare breeds of students who assist incoming students and their parents during orientation. They are easily identified by their matching outfits and name tags. They have been known to help students and parents at check-in and check-out, escort student groups, share their knowledge of campus resources, and be very energetic! Their leader is Dr. Richard Mullendore, Associate Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs, who is reportedly the most energetic hyper one of the lot. Upon approaching one of these individuals, formulate tons of questions about the University so as to distract them. Beware!

FROM THE OFFICE OF THE DEAN OF STUDENTS

Attending college for the first time provides a unique opportunity to be on one's own. Parents are not around to discipline all the time and one can come and go as one pleases. There are parties to go to on the weekends, and they may be on or off campus; parties most assuredly abound at the beginning of each year. -- So, where is all this leading?

... To partying responsibly and respecting community residents.

When you go to a party off campus, be responsible by making you friends (and yourself) accountable for undisciplined behavior. Make sure empty cans and bottles are pitched into refuse containers provided for that purpose.

Avoid being noisy late at night while walking through neighborhoods. Remember, there are working people and families with small children in those homes. Yelling and cursing is not only rude and ill-mannered, it disturbs people's rest. Most importantly, that type of behavior does not represent the calibre of a UNCW student.

If you see a group of your friends doing something in a neighbor's yard that they shouldn't be doing, STOP THEM! After all, you want to continue going to parties and having fun without complaints from the neighbors and/or police interruptions.

For those living in residence halls, don't be disruptive on the floor when returning from off campus parties. Respect the resident assistant (RA) or Campus Police Officer if they request that you be quiet in the hall. Remember, there are other students trying to get a good night's sleep.

In August 1989, Chancellor Wagoner endorsed a "Statement on Community Responsibility" which reads:

"A large part of the collegiate experience involves the development of a sense of community of learning to live with a variety of other people."

"While you're at UNCW, you will share the life of two communities— that of the campus and that of the city."

"We encourage you to exercise your responsibility in respecting the rights of your neighbors. You will find that by communicating with your neighbor, you will resolve any difficulties or conflicts that may occur. We believe that respect and communication are the keys to peaceful coexistence among neighbors."

"The campus and the city each has its own set of complexities, but both are part of the rich experience you have when you live and work here."

"It is our hope that these words will help you take responsibility for and grow in your sense of community."

REMEMBER: HAVING A GOOD NEIGHBOR IN YOU HALL AND/OR COMMUNITY MEANS BEING A GOOD NEIGHBOR, AND BEING A GOOD NEIGHBOR MEANS PARTYING RESPONSIBLY.

Greek Row May Get Under Way

by Phillip Loughlin

Editor-at-Large

Nearly five months after the official groundbreaking, construction is set to begin on Olympus Park. Originally slated to have been completed last fall, the $6.2 million Greek Row complex has run into several obstacles.

The latest problem has been securing permanent financing for the venture. According to Dick Cronk, President of College Dorm Corporation (CDC), the project presented a unique situation to banks and investors. Banks are usually willing to finance apartment buildings, because they are easily marketable. Greek housing plans, however, called for shared space instead of individual living units. Because of this layout, if for some reason the Greeks were unable to move in, the units would be unsalable as individual apartments.

Another problem cited by Cronk was the unstable economy.

As of June 12 however, Cronk stated that permanent financing was in place. "Money is loosening up a bit," he said. "Banks are looking at this a little more favorably."

Energy is now focused on land planning and renewing the building permits. Cronk expected to be "physically getting something done" within two weeks.

In late April, the Greek Presidents' Council (GPC) met with CDC and the construction company to determine whether to commit to the project. Two sororities and six fraternities signed contracts and were told that they would be able to move in for the fall '91 semester. According to Cronk, the project may be a little behind schedule. "We hope to have everybody in by the semester," Cronk said. "Whether or not that is reasonable will depend on how fast we can get things going. ... If we are not ready, we'll make arrangements for student living."

A stipulation in the housing contracts states that CDC will provide housing for Greeks if the project is not complete. Any costs above the contracted lease agreement will be met by CDC.

There are seventeen Greek organizations slated to go into the project when all is completed, although only eight will move into the first phase.

SGA UPDATE

What is SGA???

SGA or Student Government Association is the voice of the students. At UNC-W it is our job to represent the students in all facets of University Life. Another function of SGA is to provide services for the students to meet their needs. Among these include the funding of various clubs, courtesy phones in both Unions, and Seahawk Shuttle funding. Other services that are in the works are legal services for the students, lower prices for books, and the individual projects of the senators. We meet every Monday night in Room 100 to do battle against the injustices heaped against the students. Please stop by and watch the wheels of justice turn (and sometimes clog).

Super Savings with Student Discount Cards

Sub Station II, Bojangles, Hot Wax Surf Shop - all places that UNCW students spend a lot of time and money. SGA would like to help with the bill!

The UNCW Student Government Association, in cooperation with local retailers, has put together a discount card offering super savings. The card includes over thirty area businesses offering such deals as 10-20% off and buy one get one free.

SGA President, Curtis Wilson, says that the card was developed in order to help students with a commonly low budget. "We hope students will use the cards. After all, every penny counts."

Look for your student discount card in your campus mailbox.

Take A Faculty/Staff Member to Lunch

This year SGA will be implementing a new program titled "Take a Faculty/Staff Member to Lunch." The program, which begins August 22, originated out of an attempt to promote communication and awareness between the students and the faculty/staff.

Each week Housing and Food Services will donate 10 meals to be used at any on-campus dining facility; the cafeteria, Hawk's nest or Center Stage Cafe.

In order to treat a faculty/staff, students must sign up a week prior to the luncheon engagement in the SGA office. All students are eligible to participate and they are responsible for the cost of their own meal.

YOU ARE INVITED for brunch. Monday, August 19 from 9 to 11:30 the Student Government Association will host a brunch on the front lawn of campus. The event was organized to greet new members of the UNCW community and to welcome everyone back from summer vacation. All students, faculty and staff are invited to attend. Come join us!

How to get INVOLVED!

Every fall we hold elections for 11 positions in the Senate. Four of those slots are specifically for the Freshman Class: President, Vice-President, and two Senators. The other seven spots are fall representatives-at-large which are open to all classes, Freshmen, Sophomores, Juniors, and Seniors. Registration begins Thursday, August 22 and an interest meeting will be held Monday, August 26. Registration ends Tuesday, September 3 and a mandatory candidates meeting will be on Thursday, September 5. Campaigning starts and doesn't end until after the elections which are September 18, 19. Stop by the SGA office and talk with us. We have lots of information to share.

The SGA Office is located upstairs in the University Union, Room 200.

Students 'Dig' Archaeology

by Holly Price
Staff Writer

The sun beats down as heat rises from the smoldering sand creating a hazy view of the Cape Fear River. The temperature feels like it must be at least 90 degrees, but the friendly voice on the radio says the heat index is 105. Sweat runs down your face as you shovel the last bit of dirt you think is humanly possible. Does this sound like something similar to working on a chain gang? Perhaps it does, but in actuality it is UNCW students taking Anthropology 311 this summer.

This class has been fondly called the "dig class", "Sun Tan 311", and, what most people would like to believe, "the definite 'A'". However one would like to perceive it, this class entails a great deal more than your average three hour summer school class. For starters it can be worth up to six hours credit, which is one of the things that appeals to some students.

Diggers arrive at UNCW at 7:00 a.m. to load Dr. Tom Loffield's big green truck with various instruments ranging from your basic shovel to an instrument called a transit which helps measure ground elevations. Next, diggers journey about forty miles to the site located on the Cape Fear River, not far from Leland. The land is owned by Hugh McCrae, but he has let the university use it during the summer ever since 1986. During the winter the entire property is used by Mr. McCrae as a hunting

This site was chosen because of its historical background. In 1664 a group of English people arrived from Barbados to settle a colony called Charles Towne, but the colony failed and they returned home in 1667. Along with English habitations, Indian villages were also supposed to have been in the same area before and after the settlers were there. The foundation of an 18th century plantation house, which was excavated several summers ago by UNCW students also lies on the property.

Diggers this summer are working on the area called Charles Towne, which looks nothing like a town, but more like a huge grassy field on the Cape Fear River. Some of the site has already been excavated, so that leaves students with some indication of where to start measuring off their 10 ft. by 10 ft. square. This square becomes the center of the diggers world for the next few days as they shovel down about eight inches and sift the soil to remove artifacts from the earth. When finished with this task they scrape the last bits of dirt from the ground with an instrument called a trowel and then a picture is taken from an elevated platform.

Most commonly found artifacts include Indian pottery, colonial pottery, and the occasional colonial smoking pipe. This may sound rather insignificant, but the little things are what is usually important to the archaeologist. "It's not each individual things we find, it's the whole picture that's important. We put everything together and can tell so much about the original site," said Dr. Tom Loffield, the UNCW Archaeology professor in charge of the excavation this summer.

Dr. Loffield has been leading similar excavations with UNCW students since 1977. Several sites have included Bald Head Island, Carolina Beach, and Indian sites in Onslow County. "We will probably be at the Charles Towne site for many summers to come because there is so much here," said Dr. Loffield.

Students have taken this class for various reasons. Some people did it for the grade, some for something to do, and others because they are Anthropology majors.

"I did it because I figured I'd get an A," said one student.

Whatever the reason most found it to be more than they expected. "I think it's a whole lot harder than I expected it to be," said Angela Swain.

Tim Hayes stated another downfall, "The heat is awful out here. I never expected it to be so hot."

Being a digger, no matter how you look at it is an experience one is not likely to forget. If you began the class knowing nothing about Archaeology by the end of the four and a half weeks you either love it or hate it. "Some people learn a great deal out here, it's all what you make of it," said Dr. Loffield.

Sculpture On Display In Kenan Hall

UNCW News

John Torres, Jr., a nationally recognized sculptor in stone with over 30 years experience, will exhibit major pieces of his work in Kenan Hall from June 3 through July 26 as a part of UNCW's Artsfest '91.

Torres, whose work has been accepted to tour U.S. embassies throughout Europe, installed his exhibit on Sunday, June 2, in Kenan Hall lobby and patio.

Torres also delivered a lecture and slide presentation in Kenan Hall.

Torres' work has been favorably reviewed by art museums across the country. Trained in both direct and indirect carving, Torres can pull an image from "found" stones at a quarry or follow models with precision carving.

Torres' studio in Pietrasanta, Italy, gives him access to the best marbles and support services in the world. A studio in Richmond, Va., gives him access to U.S. markets.

Torres says that when at his best he can "hear the stones speak" and he is "most alive" when covered with stone dust. His work will be on exhibit during the months of June and July.

Community Should Accept Students

If you check an aerial photo of this campus when Wilmington College first became the University of North Carolina at Wilmington, you will see a different place than what exists now.

College Road was a two-lane street surrounded mostly by trees growing from undeveloped soil. There were no supermarkets around; no restaurants, no department stores, no banks. Given that fact, it's not hard to understand that there were also very few jobs, and very little revenue from the College Road area.

Of course, all of that is different now. College Road is teeming with businesses. (Unfortunately it is also teeming with stoplights.)

The rapid development of the district is due largely to the market created by the students, faculty, and staff of UNCW. Few would argue that the student population of the university is a boon to the local economy. The student market provides jobs, city revenue, and money in the pockets of local merchants. And the locals think that is just fine. They are tolerant of the UNCW students, as long as they are young and single.

But trying to live in "their" neighborhoods? That is going too far.

Conflicts between students and local citizens have been going on for a while. Citizens have pushed the local government to tighten enforcement of local noise ordinances, which is fine. But they have also effected the passage of ordinances to make student living more difficult. They pushed for a law forbidding more than three unrelated persons to live in the same household, which was passed. They also managed to change zoning laws to upset the plans of the builders of Greek Row, effectively banning it from any Wilmington residential area.

And just last Sunday, the Morning Star reported on citizens of the Eastwind neighborhood who are trying to halt the building of two apartment-style houses. They wanted the building stopped because the houses might attract students to their formerly-unspoiled area. One resident who opposed the building said, "We like our neighborhood. There are lots of kids in it."

Who do they think we are—mannerless, date-raping, kid-harming ogres from out of town?

We are not. The vast majority of the students on this campus are responsible, hard working, and reasonably courteous. The same seems to be true for the majority of Wilmington residents.

The only ways students and community members can establish healthy relations is by forgetting all of the stereotypes and prejudices. Get it together folks, the university is not going anywhere. We're all in it for the long haul.

A RESUME, COVER LETTER, AND...HO-HO! A TWENTY DOLLAR BILL! THIS KID'S GOT SPUNK!

My VW Bus Kicked Off

Pardon my self indulgence this week but I am in mourning. My Volkswagen camper-van, known affectionately as "Campie" died on US Route 74, 50 yards off I-95 outside of Lumberton.

I've had that thing 15 years! When it died, it had 198,000 miles on it. In one way, I have no right to complain but I have 198,000 miles on me too with that car! I mean, we've been through a lot together—trips to Maine, Montreal, Wisconsin, Florida, 7 1/2 times around the world at the Equator! My twelve year old Erin has grown up in and with that camper. Really, this is the vehicle where I learned to change drivers without ever stopping the car. This is the vehicle that you could pull off the road in the pouring rain, cook dinner, wash up, get ready for bed and go to sleep without ever opening a door! This is the car, when you look at it from the front with its spare tire mounted on its nose, looked like it was always smiling. REALLY!

Now I grant you that it was pretty old and showing some signs of age like the windshield starting to leak, the tailgate leaking, parts breaking and having to be replaced and no heat in the winter; but it just had no right to go and have a heart attack and die (the engine seized up, froze solid even with oil in the crank case—Hmmm!). And it was especially unfair of it to die at 10:00 at night with only my wife and daughter in it and me, a guilt-ridden 200 miles away, in a comfortable motel!

And there's another level of attachment that most of you will never be able to understand. Only owners of Volkswagen Campers or, maybe, owners of the remaining Beetles know anything about the comradery we share. Camper owners have a great image; we're really "in" and "cool". One camper never passes another camper on the road without tooting the horn and waving at absolute strangers who are joined with a mystical bond of great depth and significance—the few, the proud, the VW Campers! Yep, only another VW owner can truly commiserate with me and provide the emotional support of which I stand in need at this moment of deep loss in my life.

What's worse, "Campie" has deserted me and left me with my father's car which is a little old man's car that ruins my image completely! It's just not fair. And any religious nut that says we shouldn't value "things" too much just doesn't understand VW owners.

I do confess that in the past year I have thought about and even tried to sell "Campie". It must have heard and decided that suicide was the only way just to get even with me for even thinking about such a dastardly deed.

Anyway, funeral arrangements are being made by Sunset Automotive and a viewing and service will be held this Friday. Call for information if you wish to attend. The body has been donated to automotive science for transplantation of body parts.

A Voice Out Of Chaos by Phillip Loughlin

Luck Sometimes Helps Bad Judgement

I hear about it every year as this time. It's all over the news. Graphic footage of mangled steel and shattered glass and asphalt spattered with blood. . . . the blood of seventeen and eighteen year old kids. . . . the blood of freshly graduated high school students out to celebrate what should have been a starting point in their lives.

When I see these things, I think about how I parted the night I graduated from high school. I graduated in a rural area, and the spot we chose to hold our party was down a dirt road. It was always great fun to whip the wheel on that road to make the other drivers mad. I was doing it that night as I made a "beer run". Once or twice the car nearly got out of my control, but I always got it back at the last minute. I sprinted down the straight parts of the road, clocking seventy or eighty miles per hour. I was also slammed drunk.

I remember that night how I slid from the dirt road onto the paved highway, and how my tires suddenly found traction and launched me into the path of an oncoming eighteen wheeler. I missed him, or he missed me, or maybe I died that night and nobody told me. At any rate, I drove on to the store, bought a case of beer, and drove back to the party. I think I drank two or three of the beers before I got back (I drove slow).

What's my point then? I didn't have a wreck. I didn't get a DUI. I didn't hit any innocent pedestrians. As a matter of fact, I think I had a really great time that night. That was almost ten years ago, and it really never bothered me to see the drinking and driving commercials started up again like they do every year at graduation time.

Someone once said that God takes care of children and fools. Well, we were both.

What was it that kept me from being one of those statistics? In retrospect, it seems like I was out there driving drunk nearly every week-end. More than once I found myself sitting in the driveway, without the slightest idea of how I got there. I wasn't the only one either. Living in the country, there aren't too many gathering places that are within walking distance. In fact, most of my friends lived better than three miles away. Most of my friends either drove drunk or rode around with someone who had been drinking. Yet, when I go to my ten year reunion I expect that I will find them all there, intact and with valid driver's licenses.

Does this mean that the statistics are over-rated? Does it mean that the commercials are full of it? No. It just means we were lucky. Someone once said that God takes care of children and fools. Well, we were both. If someone in Vegas had placed odds on our survival back then, he would have had a pretty hard time getting someone to put money against at least one of us dying young. But the 100-1 shot paid off in this case.

Luck. I believe this is one of the reasons teen-agers have the sense of invulnerability that leads them away from responsibility. They've seen so many lucky people. Their parents probably beat the odds in living long enough to have children. Their friends cruise through life, flying by the seats of their pants. Some of you reading this have probably done some of the same stupid things I did (and the list is a long one), yet the worse that came of it was grounding for a couple of weeks or loss of driving privileges.

But luck has a down side too. Over the three or four weeks that high schools will hold graduations this year, there will probably be several hundred alcohol related automobile accidents involving students out celebrating. A couple hundred of these accidents will include fatalities. For these guys, luck just ran out.

I'm not going to try any harder to turn you away from driving and drinking while you're at college. I expect that most of you would do it even if I told you straight up that you would probably die because of it. You trust your luck. You think there is no reason not to. Unfortunately as it is, the only thing that might change your minds is experience.

LETTER FROM THE PRESIDENT

Get Involved With UNCW

Dear Students,

Welcome to the University of North Carolina at Wilmington from student government and myself. I am Curtis Wilson, the current Student Body President. You have made a wise decision in your college career in choosing UNC-W. I am a rising senior and have enjoyed each of my three years at this university. What has made the experience so enjoyable was the multitude of opportunities that are found on this campus to augment the academic side.

Three years ago when I attended orientation I was a bit intimidated by the large numbers of people and the physical size of the campus, but to help guide me through it was my orientation leader, Melissa Byrd. The two days I spent in her group, The Butterfingers, taught me a lot about the campus and the people. The orientation leaders are picked and trained so that they can help you adjust to the switch from high school to college. They are here to answer your questions and if they don't have the answers they can direct you to someone who can. One thing I learned and want to pass on to you, the incoming freshmen class, is to get involved.

This campus has over eighty registered clubs and organizations which are just looking for intelligent and innovative new students. These include the sports clubs, fraternities and sororities, special interest groups, and academic clubs. Also on this campus are other opportunities such as committees, Ambassadors, Emerge and Orientation Leaders. Many volunteer opportunities exist in the UNC-W area and the majority have been organized into a booklet called Volunteer. Another experience worth trying is the media such as The Seahawk, our school newspaper, WLOZ, the campus radio station, or The Atlantis, our literary magazine. Another organization which I think can give you many valuable skills is Student Government.

Student government is the representative body for the students. We allocate about a quarter of a million dollars of your student fees. That money is used to provide services for the students and the help fund some student organizations. The student senate, made up of 33 students, decides where the money goes based on availability and need.

Some services we provide are courtesy phones in both student unions, discount tickets to area movie theaters, partial funding for the Seahawk Shuttle, and a discount card useable for savings at area merchants.

Each fall we hold elections for four Freshmen Class Officers and seven Fall Representatives. This year registration will start August 22 and end September 3. The elections will be on September 18.

My student government experience at UNCW started my freshman year when I was elected Freshmen Class President. Next I became Sophomore Class Vice-President, then I moved up to Junior Class President and finally, the big cheese, Student Body President. Also, I was Judicial Board Chairman for two years and this past year I was President Pro-tem of the Senate.

Besides Student Government I have been involved in other mind broadening activities. I have been an orientation leader since the second half of my freshman year. Long live the Scuba Divers!!! I am a member of the UNCW Ultimate Frisbee Club. We have been second in the nation for the past two years. For a year and a half out of the past three years that I lived on campus in the residence halls I have been a Resident Assistant. Which is basically an orientation leader that lives on each floor in the residence halls. I have also been involved in clubs and committees, too many to be listed.

How do you find out about all these activities? There are four places I suggest you become familiar with in your freshman year. The Leadership Center, Student Activities Office, Student Government Office, and the Dean of Students Office. Between these four places information can be gathered on any activity that you are interested in. They are all conveniently located on the second floor of the University Union. Any one of these offices is more than willing to answer any questions and can direct you to where you need to go for further assistance. I urge you to at least stop by each office and look around.

To sum it up, this University is a place for you to grow and expand. Not only through academics but also through extracurricular activities. To get the most out of your college career, start now and form a healthy blend of all—the academic, social, and extracurricular facets.

Once again I am Curtis Wilson and if I can ever be of any assistance don't hesitate to let me know. I hold regular office hours in the SGA office and the telephone number there is 395-3553. I also wander the campus a lot, so stop me and chat. Enjoy your summer and I'll look for you in the fall.

ARTS AND ENTERTAINMENT

"YEAH...RIGHT!"

with RaMONA HUPP
Arts and Entertainment Editor

We Are Always Looking For Some Fresh Blood

Welcome Freshmen... the Freshmeisters... the Freshmondos... the fresh blood. Welcome. Welcome. Welcome.

The Arts & Entertainment staff of the Seahawk will be more than happy to flagrantly call your attention to the hip happenin's going on around your campus and around Wilmington. The area has more than enough to keep you busy (while you're not studying of course), and we will constantly be on the move to provide you with the latest entertainment news.

You can expect to find concert updates, WLOZ's top ten album chart, at-a-glance weekend update on all clubs and theatre events, plus movie, album, theatre and television reviews.

Movies seem to be a major source of entertainment here in "Wilmywood." (Tickets to see movies playing at Carmike Cinemas can be bought in your own Student Union; currently $3.50, and good for showings Monday-Thursday only.)

Not only are there several movie theaters to choose from but there is also an actual movie studio that frequently films around the city and beaches, and though you will easily get bored after the first ten minutes or so, the experience of watching a movie being made has its pluses.

Wilmington is also blessed with a wide array of independent theatre, playwright and acting groups that meet and perform regularly. Many of these performances can be seen at one of the nation's oldest theatres, Thalian Hall, which is located, along with a bevy of other entertainment spots, downtown. Here on campus, UNCW offers its very own symphony and two theatres of which you can attend all for free.

There are also many, MANY groups and organizations to participate in. Whatever your interest UNCW has got it for you.

For instance, our campus radio station, WLOZ, "the drop of honey in an endless sea of top forty vomit" (they are such romantics), is always looking for some sick individuals.

But the fun doesn't stop there. ACE (Association for Campus Entertainment) always needs volunteers to help plan, and execute concerts, homecoming events, film showings, hosting comedians, outdoor parties and much, much more. Of course the Seahawk is always on the lookout for some dedicated souls as well.

Getting involved with these clubs can be more than just rewarding; many times you learn more than you thought you would, make lifelong friends and "connections", and in some cases you actually get paid for your hard work... and hey, it looks great on a resume.

So, you can see that there is a lot to do in Wilmington. Heck, just give me a call and I'll will be your personal guide and chauffeur. "Yeah... right!"

Road Trips In Progress

Are you tired of lounging around in the surf and sun? Then it's time for a ROAD TRIP!

Raleigh and Charlotte arenas are offering some pretty hefty names on their marquee this summer.

Concert promoters are crossing their fingers this summer in hopes that tickets sales will be up from the dismal winter/spring season, which had bands canceling dates, and some scrapping their whole tour schedules.

Below is a complete listing of area shows to choose from, gratefully provided by SURF 107. For more information call them out 251-1075.

ACE Is For You

ACE (Association for Campus Entertainment), the entertainment masters of the universe (okay, so maybe just the entertainment masters of the University) have in the past brought you a galaxy of campus events.

Last year they organized the Smithereens concert, not to mention the Chairmen of the Board and the Pot. Potato Head outdoor concert/barbecue bashes. They brought you comedian Henry Cho, which turned out a record crowd, Giancarlo Esposito (actor from many of Spike Lee's films), plus showings of popular films and sports events. They just could not seem to stop their maddening pace! And they are already planning next year's events. It's almost scary.

ACE, for the first time, will be responsible for planning and coordinating our annual Homecoming celebration. Many volunteers are needed. If you are interested, in any of these events, contact their office 202 UJU.

SHARK'S PREY

Drivin' 'N' Cryin' Is A Lot Better Than REM's Whinin' and Cryin'

by Mark Scharaga
Music Reviewer

Mark "the Shark" Scharaga here to explain my methods of reviewing new music. I like most kinds of music, but my favorite is rock-n-roll. I try not to criticize others, like, say MTV, but occasionally I do. Hey, I've got to have my fun!

I rate on a Shark's tooth scale: the best being 10, and worst 0. If you have any suggestions, forget them! I'm perfect! I don't need no stinkin' suggestions.

TOP TEN THINGS TO DO THIS SUMMER

10. Go swimming in "Shark" infested waters.
9. Break up with your boyfriend.
8. Then call the Shark (number is in the phone book).
7. If busy keep trying.
6. Boycott MTV.
5. Tell your parents you on the verge of a mental collapse (So you don't have to get a summer job and just sponge off them.)
4. Get a summer job in Kuwait.
3. Hang out at the beach and pick up trash after everyone leaves.
2. Join the local bridge club.

1. Tell your boss (at the end of the summer): "Get a life!"

REM
Out of Time
Warner Bros.
7 1/2 Sharks Teeth

REM is back, but not better.

The social awareness is still there, but the somberness of the music is far more evident than in any of their past releases.

What I liked about the album was that some songs are reminiscent of those off their earlier albums, like "Losing My Religion" (the video of which was recently banned in Ireland), "Shine, Happy People" and "Texarkana."

"Low" describes the rest of the album. The songs are moody and slow, different than other REM material.

Yes, we know that life is hopeless, but why rub our faces in it? I can only take so much bad news at one time.

Guest vocalist Kate Pierson, of the B-52's, adds a nice touch with her vocal range to the songs "Shine Happy People" and "Me in Honey."

It's a shame a band with as much talent and awareness is reduced to whining and crying.

Drivin' 'N' Cryin'
Fly Me Courageous Island Records
8 1/2 Shark's Teeth

The southern boys are back with their follow-up to Mystery Road. This time they used mainstream rock producer Geoff Workman to try and maintain that Drivin' 'N' Cryin' sound.

Their Mystery Road LP was almost the best album of 1988, and to change the formula of what I called brilliance, would have been complete suicide.

I thought wrong, as basically this is the same Drivin' 'N' Cryin' as before. The songs aren't quite as good as on previous albums, but they are passable.

With such a mainstream producer (Workman also produced Queensryche), I expected a much more polished sound, but Drivin' 'N' Cryin' still has the same garage band feel and sound. Kevin Kinney's folksy vocals are a delight in a time where every band tries to be the same.

It seems that Georgia has produced a lot of successful new wave garage bands, and despite a slight stumble, Drivin' 'N' Cryin' is almost there.

Best Songs- Fly Me Courageous, For You, Around the Block Again, and The Innocent.

The band Drivin' 'N' Cryin', consisting of (clockwise from top) Jeff Sullivan, drums; Tim Neilson, bass; Kevin Kinney, lead singer and guitar; Katie Pierson, guitar, are now touring to promote their latest album Fly Me Courageous. Read the Seahawk for further details about their upcoming local performances.

Drivin' 'N' Cryin' Courageously Flying Close to Super-Stardom

by Keith Gordon
College Press Services

With the success of his group's fourth album, Drivin' 'N' Cryin's Kevin Kinney officially is a budding rock star who almost won't.

"I've been into rock and roll my whole life," Kinney says, but not always as a participant. "I started out being a critic, writing about it," he recalls. "Then I became a roadie. I worked in a record store, became a buyer and eventually joined a punk band."

In 1983, however, "I quit. I got into the car with my girlfriend and drove South," ending up in Atlanta.

"I gave it all up and became a carpenter. A lot of my friends had gotten signed. (by record companies) and I thought, 'well, maybe this just isn't for me. I've had my fun and now I'm moving on.'"

All that changed when Kinney met bassist Tim Neilson.

"Tim and I met each other in the streets of Atlanta just tooling around. He was in a real popular band. I played him a tape I made, and he really dug it," Kinney explained.

"He drove me around town trying to find people for me to play with. Finally, he couldn't find anybody, so he could quit his band and we started a band on the side, kind of a secret band, called Drivin' 'N' Cryin'."

Describing their early sound, Kinney says, "It was a hard rock-psychedelic-country thing. Violent Femmes meet Black Sabbath meet Chocolate Watchband."

"It wasn't long until we got our first gig," Kinney says.

Happily, the popularity of Neilson's previous band and the local notoriety of some of its members helped the fledgling D'N'C make the most of the opportunity.

"Tim, having been a member of this really big local band, (made) our first gig a pretty big success. We just started playing, and all of the money we made we put back into the band."

It was 1985, and D'N'C began playing the southeastern circuit in places like Nashville, Birmingham and Chapel Hill.

The group recorded its first album, Scared But Smarter, in three days at Atlanta nightclub 688's independent label. Soon, D'N'C graduated to Island Records, where the band members recorded their three subsequent albums.

But in a lot of ways, Kinney points out, the group's new album, Fly Me Courageous, is the first "real D'N'C album."

"We had these three albums out that had all this weird stuff on them," he elaborated. "Country, folk, stuff like that. And we weren't playing those songs live anymore."

The band recruited producer Geoff Workman to work on Fly Me Courageous. Workman, a twenty-five-year veteran of the industry, had worked with some of the biggest names in the business. From The Cars, and Queen to Journey and Motley Crue.

"We flew him down to Statesboro, Ga., to see us play in a little, tiny bar," Kinney says. "We really socked it to him without the light show or anything; just us, in a bar." The resulting collaboration may well turn out to be a career-making album for the band.

A hard-rocking mixture of street-level music with just a hint of country and folk influences, D'N'C has matured into one of America's premiere rock and roll bands.

"The record has got a real rock and roll edge," Kinney says, "but it's still got my poetic stream of consciousness in the lyrics. They're not really story songs, just short bursts; reflections of the world around me."

BillyClub Fest, revs up the crowd in the infamous "pit" at The Mad Monk.

Try One, Try Them All

by RaMonA Hupp
Arts & Entertainment Editor

Are you planning on going out tonight? Not sure where to go? Well, just open your trusty Seahawk to the Arts and Entertainment page, where you are bound to find plenty to do every weekend.

If dancing to pulsating music is what you like then Wilmington has plenty to offer.

The New Zoo (was there ever an Old Zoo?) is the newest club, and is located in the Marketplace Shopping Center. They also offer an under twenty one night on Sundays.

The Odyssey offers two clubs in one. There are two different sections so you can either listen to a live band or DJ. "College night" is on Thursday.

Club Rio (in the Ramada Inn) advertises dancing at no cover charge.

If you are looking for something different than downtown is the place to go. It is not the typical college crowd scene. It has more of an "artsy-craftsy" feel to it. The downtown regulars vary from a blessed abundance of local aspiring and established writers, actors, artists and other free spirited souls. Two of the most popular clubs are Jacob's Run and Front Street News.

Jacob's Run- On Thursday night there is NO other place to be than at Jacob's, for on this night Karaoke takes place. Karaoke is a Japanese inspired type of entertainment that puts you in the spotlight! The club is equipped with a stage, a microphone, and a giant television screen where videos are shown. The only problem is the videos are missing the lead vocals. That is where you come in. You can select from a wide variety of songs to sing, from show tunes, to country, to the B-52's. You just sign up, and wait for your name to be called. If you want a table, you will need to get there before eleven, after that it is standing room only. Best of all, there is no cover charge.

The club also hosts a variety of bands on Friday and Saturday nights, check to the left for that information.

Jacob's Run does require membership for those wishing to spend time in the upstairs viewing area and bar, but the downstairs is still open to the general public.

Front Street News- offers food, music, drinks and reading materials. What a concept.

The Beach Scene- The establishments at Wrightsville Beach, tend to be a lot smaller, but that doesn't mean they are any less fun! Gussiepe's, like the downtown bars, also serves dinner and munchies to chow down on. Another favorite is the legendary Red Dogs, for dancin' and drinkin' fun.

Are you in the mood to see a hard core, rockin' band? Then there is no place else than the Mad Monk.

The Mad Monk really does the best job of consistently bringing in the best of the new and upcoming bands, along with some old favorites. You don't have to have a membership, unless you won't go upstairs. Cover charges are usually less with college IDs, and you can get in if you're under twenty-one.

Baxstage also offers live bands, and hosts Greco nights for fraternities from campus.

If country music is your thing there are two clubs in the area just for you. Yellow Rose Saloon and Country Music, USA.

Results Are Back From Sex Survey

In November 1990 the UNCW Sexual Assault Advisory Board conducted a survey among 430 students through selected classes. The 33 question survey dealt with three areas of concern about the issue of rape (the knowledge level, attitudes, and personal experiences), and asked students about their participation in sexual assault education programs on campus.

The results of the survey, which was self-administered, anonymous, and voluntary in nature, are being studied by the Board to continually assist the university in providing education and developing policy. The Board surveyed a student sample comprised of freshman (29.5%), sophomores (32.9%), juniors (20.3%), seniors (13.6%), graduate students (2.9%), and unclassified students (0.9%); 54.3% were female and 45.4% were male.

The survey did not assess if any of the respondents' rapes occurred on campus or when they occurred. National statistics indicate that the 16-19 year old age group is most affected by crimes of sexual assault. The age groups surveyed at UNCW thus gives the Board an idea where UNCW students stand in relation to national statistics. According to various national studies on college campuses, at least 20% of female students have been raped - 12% during the past year; of the women students who were raped, 33% had been assaulted more than once.

While some responses were encouraging in terms of student awareness and attitudes, a surprising number, particularly among males, showed common myths and misinformation that appear to be prevalent among the UNCW student population sample. These results can be significant in showing various university and community agencies that students still need accurate information. In some cases, counseling may be required to change attitudes and behaviors. The results certainly emphasize the importance of sexual assault awareness workshops which, unfortunately, are often poorly attended.

Among significant responses were those related to rape occurrences. (Figures have been rounded to the nearest percentage point.) On UNCW's campus 43% of males and 60.8% of females recognized date rape as a serious problem. The majority of students (79% of males, 86% of females) did know that over 50% of all rapes that occur are acquaintance rapes between people who have met before. Among college students nationally, over 80% of attacks are acquaintance or date rapes.

The circumstances and motivations for rape were also areas of misinformation among respondents. Surprisingly, the majority of students were either wrong about or unaware of the following facts:

The majority of rapes happen in private residences.

(25% of males and 24% of females disagreed; 34% of males and 35% of females did not know.) Actually, 60% of all rapes occur in the victims' or assailants' own homes.

Nearly all rape victims are raped by someone of the same race.

(39% of males and 51% of females disagreed; 32% of males and 28% of females did not know.) Statistics show that well over 90% of rapes are interracial. Black male-white female accounts for about 3.3% of reported rapes; white male-black female accounts for about 3.6%.

Rape Victims are usually physically injured by the rapist.

(64% of males and 54% of females were wrong, while 16% of males and 19% of females did not know.) Although there may not be physical injuries, psychological damage can be devastating. Often survivors are in shock or withdrawn. Feelings of guilt or shame are common reactions. After a rape, about one in three college women say that they thought of suicide, one in three seek counseling, and one in four take self-defense courses. Over 80% of survivors of sexual assault report the rape permanently changed their lives.

Most rapists are not involved in a satisfactory sexual relationship at the time of the offense.

(25% of males and 18% of females were wrong while 43% of males and 39% of females did not know.) Actually, most rapists have wives or girlfriends in satisfying relationships at the time of their offense. Rape is a crime of violence and anger, not of sexual attraction.

A person who gets another person drunk or drugged in order to have intercourse is guilty of rape.

While a majority of students knew this to be true, a surprising number were incorrect or did not know (25% of males, 10% of females). Among college students nationally, over half of the survivors and three-quarters of attackers had been drinking prior to a sexual assault.

The results of the attitudes surveyed also show some areas for serious concern. Commonly held myths often form a basis for action or inaction in potentially dangerous situations. For instance, a significant percentage of respondents (shown in parentheses) still believe the following myths, or said they did not know whether the statements were true. Remember, all of these myths are false generalizations: They may occasionally be true, but most often they are not.

*Women sometimes say no to sex with men, but really mean yes. (28% males, 14% females)

*Many reports of rape are made by women who are angry or who "get caught" having sex. (29% males, 14% females)

*A woman can stop a man who is trying to rape her if she really wants to. (18% males, 5% females)

*Women who verbally and physically resist rape are about as likely to be seriously injured or killed as women who don't. (44% males, 46% females)

The responses dealing with personal experiences revealed that about 42% of women and 25% of men report being "touched sexually" when they didn't want to be; and 45% of women and 23% of men felt coerced into kissing or petting against their will. While 16% of women (close to the national college average) and 11% of men said they had been "forced to engage in sexual intercourse", only 11% of women and 4% of men said they had been raped. Such conflicting results may imply difficulty in coming to terms with being a rape victim or they may imply lack of awareness of the definition of rape. On nearly all of the topics in our study, males showed lower levels or awareness than females. These statistics bear out the urgency of continuing education, particularly among younger, less experienced students who are in the most vulnerable age groups.

The survey study was coordinated by Ginny Jones, lecturer in the English Department and chairperson of the Advisory Board's Education Subcommittee. Ms. Li-Shing Wang, Director of Student Life Studies, compiled the survey results and cross-tabulated responses based on gender and specific requests from the Education Subcommittee.

A: I don't mind if they want to take my 'New Mainstream.' But I don't know that they really identify with what that is: That's fiscal responsibility, but with compassion. And that compassion has to be shown in terms of a riddance of regressive taxes.

You can't equivocate on civil rights. ... I'm afraid it's a fleeting political gimmick ...

Q: Do you think the United States was right in using force in the Persian Gulf? Had you been in Congress, would you have voted to use it?

A: I would have taken the same view that (Gen.) Colin Powell took (on letting economic sanctions work longer. As a matter of fact, I voiced that.

What bothers me now is that (Secretary of State James) Baker and others are calling now for the use of sanctions against Saddam.

Q: What are the major issues ... facing this nation?

A: The domestic policy and the direction this country has to go. Education is very, very vital. The environment is very, very vital. Crime, and with that you speak of the decaying cities and the infrastructure, the decline of rural America and then fiscal responsibility.

The savings and loan debacle hasn't been really addressed. And reclaiming our young people, which is abysmal in term of their drift. They are the issues as I see them.

Housing Office Plans Changes To Attract Students

by Amy Petrocelli
Staff Writer

The arrival of the fall semester will bring changes for the residence halls and apartments on campus. According to Charles Maimone, Director of Housing/Food Service, a "five year capital improvement plan has been designed which includes factors...necessary to get the halls in the best shape they can be."

Maimone stated that the improvements in 1991 will range from new roofs for the apartments to new furniture in hall lobbies, and will cost approximately $160,000.

Maimone said that after collecting information and suggestions from hall government meetings, he was able to organize everything into proposals which included things that "must be done" and things that housing "would like to see done". After the consideration of cost and priority, the following things were decided upon and will be ready for the fall semester.

In the apartments area, Maimone stated that some rooftops will be replaced this summer and new carpets will be put in about 20 apartments. Also, in the apartment area, near the laundry facility, will be a convenience store. Although it is something that is actually in the area of food service, Maimone stated that it definitely has an effect on housing.

Improvements for Galloway Hall include carpeting the hallways on "at least two or three floors," said Maimone. Also the lobby will be renovated with new furniture and plants to give the hall a "more welcoming appearance."

Maimone stated that Galloway will have an all-women residence hall after this academic year. This, he explained, is due to the male/female ratio and the fact that the amount of females wanting to live in Belk overrides the available space. Belk Hall on the other hand will become a co-ed dormitory.

Belk Hall, as well as Graham will see renovations in the lobby and lounge areas. Belk will also be re-painted and mattresses will be replaced.

Maimone also stated that he is working with academic computing to put a computer cluster in the lounge of Belk Hall. The facility, he explained, will be something that can be taken advantage of by all residents, not just those of Belk.

Finally, in the suites area will be a volleyball pit which was requested by Hall Government, and Maimone stated that some landscaping is already underway to beautify the area.

Maimone explained that the process by which these improvements were decided upon involved going into the buildings and deciding what would be most important for this year in the five-year plan. Incidentally, he stated that the "five-year plan" will be an on-going plan, as with each new year new things will come up that will need done.

"What we're most excited about is that we're formalizing the plan and getting to a point where we will regularly make improvements," said Maimone.

Also in the improvement plan Maimone stated, "One of the things I felt was really important to do was to try to involve students a little bit in the decisions. Since everyone has different priorities of importance, we gathered information from a lot of different sources."

Sources, he explained, included people in the division of Student Affairs, like the Dean of Students and the Director of Residence Life. "The more people that have input," he stated, "the more responsible the decision."

Maimone stated that basically everything comes down to what they can afford to do. He said that the process of estimating prices is where they are at this point. He explained that suggestions that do not go through in the next year will simply be put on hold and considered for the following year.

Maimone explained that the housing office has tried to offer improvements (like repaired roofs) as well as added pleasurable features that would "encourage students to stay in the halls." He stated, "We want you back. If an apartment is nicer, then you're more likely to come back the following year."

Excited about the improvements that will soon be underway, Maimone said that what he hopes will come out of the "five-year plan" is that people will be more comfortable in campus housing. "Housing and food service are both important parts of college living," he stated. "If you're not comfortable and happy where you live, it can have an impact on your college experience."

Maimone said that there are a lot of advantages to living on campus and he stated that it is his job to try and make those advantages the greatest potential they can be. He concluded this by stating that national research indicates that most students who live on campus are more likely to do better academically on the national level than those who live off campus."

As far as UNCW's future for additional housing, Maimone stated that they do have permission to build 200 additional spaces. However, he explained that not only is there no immediate need for additional housing.

Wilder Endorses College Drug Testing

College Press Service

Drug testing of all college students moved a big political step forward April 2 when Virginia Gov. L. Douglas Wilder, a possible presidential candidate in 1992, said he would "not object a all" to mandatory drug testing of all state students.

While a handful of small, private schools already have general testing programs, no state currently has an all-inclusive effort like the one Wilder endorsed.

If it approved the effort, Virginia would be the first state to regularly test all its non-athlete students.

National drug policy Director Bob Martinez didn't like the idea, however.

"My own view is that too many college administrators have against drug use they already know they've got on their hands, and that there are any number of things they should think about doing before anyone begins discussing random drug testing," Martinez told 200 representatives of sororities and fraternities April 5.

Wilder remained insistent.

"Rather than offering a proactive policy to stamp out illegal drug activity on our nation's college campuses, Mr. Martinez criticizes our forceful efforts in Virginia," Wilder responded.

Wilder made his original announcement at a press conference after he met with administrators, and appointed a special task force to examine how state colleges can crack down on drug and alcohol abuse and sexual assault on their campuses.

"I don't think it is a bad idea for [task force members] to look at."

The meeting came almost two weeks after a drug raid at the University of Virginia (UVA) in

"I don't think it is a bad idea for [task force members] to look at" mandatory testing.

—Wilder

Other students and administrators agreed it is too early to worry about Wilder's statement.

"We're taking a wait-and-see attitude," reported Deborah Brown, director of public relations at Radford University.

UVA President John Casteen said he would have to see "a concrete proposal" before he would comment.

Dr. Anthony Santoro, president of Christopher Newport college, said he hadn't heard Wilder's suggestions on drug testing, but said he "didn't know

William and Mary.

"As we understand it, it wouldn't be upheld in any court in Virginia," she continued.

Wilder told Santoro and the other administrators he wants a thorough investigation of student conduct policies on their campuses.

"I know you share my conviction that Virginia's colleges and universities cannot be sanctuaries of immunity for a privileged class of young adults," he said.

UVA's Casteen already has imposed new drug, drinking and sexual assault rules on the school's Greek organizations, threatening to withdraw recognition of groups that don't comply with them.

Newport's Santoro wants to start his own task force to probe drug and alcohol use at his school.

"It's going to be most successful with the cooperation of people we're working with," he said.

Other schools already have started forcing students to prove their sobriety.

Rev. Jerry Falwell's Liberty University, a private campus in Lynchburg, Va., already randomly tests its students for drugs.

The University of Maryland students who have previously violated the campus's drug policy must submit to testing.

Students enrolled at the Embury-Riddle Aeronautical University of Aviation Technology are also tested.

Most college athletic departments have some sort of drug testing policy for student-athletes.

MARINE RESEARCH CENTER

Biotechnology Applications Researched

The marine biotechnology program at UNCW's Center for Marine Science Research wants to find environmental solutions to the areas environmental problems.

The environment is just one part of the diverse research at The Center for Marine Science Research (CMSR). The CMSR has been open barely a year, but already it is looking towards the future.

The Center for Marine Science Research is located next to Baby Hospital just before the Wrightsville Beach bridge. The center includes a laboratory building and a small area for marine research. The area for research is located beside the Wrightsville Beach Police Department.

Twelve unused burial crypts hold seaweed and blue crabs being used in different experiments. The outdoor area for study is ideal for the research of the CMSR scientists and students. It provides means of experimenting on different marine flora and fauna, and controlling a variety of possible environments.

According to Dr. Kimon Bird, Program Coordinator of the CMSR's brand new biotechnology program, there are unlimited applications of research into marine plants and animals.

UNCW's Center for Marine Science Research is divided into four different areas of study, oceanography, environmental research, marine physiology and biotechnology. The research taking place at CMSR takes a look at the big picture in its pursuit of worthy applications.

Bird points out the great cooperation that the facility wants to foster with other scientists. The marine physiology people at CMSR are working with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) to study calcium loss comparisons between shell fish in the ocean and human beings in space.

With the new marine biotechnology program, potential uses of biotechnology can be investigated at UNCW. Bird says he sees a future for marine biotechnology interested in genetic improvement of marine life, discovery of different uses for marine life, and cultivation of separate marine life. Bird said that he can see great effects for the future of marine research on the way that we live everyday lives.

According to Bird, marine biotechnology has two major focuses. Marine biotechnology is constantly searching for new technology that can be used by the American public. Bird stated creating a slate of new marine-based technologies for companies will attract businesses to ocean areas; ocean areas such as Wilmington. Marine technology can also help replenish the environment.

According to Bird, marine biotechnology can help to strengthen the concept of no loss replacement for wetland areas. EPA statistics in the mid-1980's to point out the various applications of marine plants. Seaweed, the seagrass, can find applications as far fetched as doughnut frosting, chocolate milk, house paint and prepared bench in front of vials of seagrass in various states of growth.

Cody is working on a project designed to replenish seagrass off of the coast of North Carolina. Since seagrass is not living off of Wrightsville Beach, Cody often travels to Beaufort or Sneads Ferry to find samples of seagrass.

Most seagrass has been destroyed, according to Cody, by diseases in the early part of the century. Dredging of waterways and the intracoastal waterway has not helped seagrass to regain a foothold. Cody said he thinks his research is important.

"Superior seagrass is important for the growth of scallops. It provides for more fish nurseries and allows for stable bottom soil settlement," said Cody. "It can be an economically valuable crop."

Dr. Bird states that he believes that the influence of UNCW's biotechnology research does more than help push marine research forward. It also helps to introduce the students of UNCW to real life solutions of real life problems.

"Students with strong emphasis in biotechnology are going to be more employable than the students who are maybe too general in their interest in biology," said Bird.

Bryan Cody makes the idea of seagrass study attractive. "Real interesting stuff, seaweed," Cody said turning to gaze at another specimen.

put the conversion of wetlands into developed lands at some 450,000 acres a year. Bird sees a future doctrine being followed by fighting the monumental loss of wetlands in creating wetland using marine biotech research.

Marine biotechnology can reach far beyond the boundaries of the beach and water. Bird is quick dairy products.

Bryan Cody, a senior in Marine Biology, is one of the twelve UNCW undergraduates working at the CMSR. Cody says he feels privileged. "It is interesting to work on something not a lot of people have worked on," said Cody, sitting at a work

If what happened on your inside happened on your outside, would you still smoke?

"Let it be said in a whisper, experience is certainly worth more than theory."

Global Volunteers Go Mexican

by Jessica Bullard
Leadership Center Intern

UNCW's first ever Global Volunteers took to the air Monday, May 13. Their destination—Puebla, Mexico.

Cathy Birmingham, Director of The Leadership Center, began working with Bob Hayward, Campus Minister, in October of 1990 to test the feasibility of performing a service project in a different country. After an organizational meeting and recruiting 10 volunteers, UNCW joined forces with East Carolina University and began the joint effort of planning a trip to Puebla, Mexico. While in Puebla, volunteers would be working in a school and residing with local families.

Volunteers from UNCW soon began preparing themselves for the 10 day trip. One of the foremost questions on everyone's mind was how to raise money to make this dream a reality. Car washes, donut sales and parades were weekend hobbies of the Global volunteers. Funds from these events helped with overall costs, but generous donations from Chancellor James Leutze, United Christian Campus Ministries and the UNCW Student Government Association (SGA) actually made the trip possible.

Brian Brinkley, a member of the UNCW team, further volunteered his time to give Spanish lessons to the group every Wednesday night of the 1991 spring semester. Together this group grew culturally and intellectually.

Anxious anticipation was felt throughout the five hour flight into Mexico City and then through the two hour bus ride . . . to Puebla.

Finally the weekend arrived! Exams were over and all of the hard work of these 12 volunteers was finally going to pay off.

UNCW Global Volunteers as well as the volunteers from East Carolina University met at the Wesley Foundation in Raleigh on Sunday, May 12. Here everyone began getting acquainted and prepared for what to expect the next day. No one could actually have been prepared for the experience they embarked on the next day; none will ever forget it.

Anxious anticipation was felt throughout the five hour flight into Mexico City and then through the two hour bus ride through the mountains to Puebla. The anticipation was largely due to the fact that once in Puebla, work assignments would be given and volunteers would meet their host families.

The work assignments were divided into two separate locations, Madero School and Madero University. Tasks to be performed at these sites varied from painting and repairing walls to cleaning the area surrounding an olympic sized swimming pool. The pool is going to be filled with well water and covered with cement so the school can have running water.

Opportunities for the group and their hosts were provided for time not spent at the work sites. Volunteers toured the town of Cholula which is host to the largest pyramid in the world. Other experiences included climbing into the world's smallest volcano, visiting cathedrals and churches made of gold, and shopping in all of the colorful markets located in Puebla.

During this week, the Global Volunteers had to overcome language barriers, cultural differences and occasional illness, but all will agree the experience was worth it. As one volunteer stated, "I never knew how far a smile would go."

After the group's work was done, they packed their bags and went back to Mexico City, which is home to 23 million people, making it the largest city in the world. Here volunteers simply enjoyed the culture that surrounded them. As a group they visited the only Basilica in the Western Hemisphere, and climbed the Aztec Pyramids.

This trip was the first of what will hopefully be many more to come at UNCW. However, trips like this only occur when dedicated volunteers set their minds for success.

The Leadership Center, located in the University Union (393-3877) will be looking for dedicated volunteers such as these to coordinate the next UNCW Global volunteer experience.

Emerge Offers Leadership Opportunities

by Mandy Hartman
Contributing Writer

"It's been an experience that will change the rest of my life—friends, fun, and growth—the Emerge Experience," says David Garriga. Many of you may wonder what the "Emerge Experience" is.

Emerge is a program of The Leadership Center that offers many opportunities for leadership and personal development. It is, "An instant opportunity for involvement. An excellent program to explore personal growth and development. A must for incoming freshmen," says Billy DeYoung. Through this program, students are given an opportunity to develop their own leadership skills, while making new friends. You do not need any leadership experience to participate. However, through Emerge, students are given the opportunity to develop, meet campus and community leaders, and become leaders themselves.

Emerge is for you if you are: energetic, caring, and motivated; would like to meet campus and community leaders; want to improve your leadership skills; and would like to make a difference at UNCW and in your community.

What does this program involve? Students active in Emerge will participate in a series of workshops on various personal development and leadership skills. The topics include communication skills, leadership styles, appreciation of diversity, ethical leadership, decision making and many more. There is also an opportunity for team building through activities such as the Ropes Course. Students also work on discovering the strengths and weaknesses of their own leadership style.

Students interested in becoming active in this program should contact The Leadership Center (University Union room 212) or by calling 393-3877.

As DiShon Cain put it, "Emerge are leaders who happen to be your friends."

Sideline Sensations

Patrick Fowler

Here's Giving You A Hand

So here I am on my bicycle, dressed to the tee in biking paraphernalia, in the middle of campus—or at least I think it is the middle, they keep building new buildings and roads here everyday. It's 2 a.m. in the morning and I'm pondering deep thoughts. Well, not really. Actually I was trying to come up with a column to prepare you, the incoming freshmen, for your collegiate years. It's a habit I should learn to break. Not the pondering but the cycling around campus in the middle of the night.

If my mother ever found out she . . . well anyway back to you, the new Seahawks.

What can I tell you about UNCW? What advice can I offer? What wisdom can I share with you kids about the different world you are about to enter? Kids? Did I say kids? What am I saying?

You're young adults now. Maybe not official by the law but in all other phases of life you are. You are about to face life mano-a-mano, one on one. No more safety nets for you buddy. It's you and old man reality now. Don't underestimate him either. He is a tough bird to figure out sometimes.

Opportunities. Boy, will there be opportunities and open doors waiting for you to set your foot in. However, be cautious and careful of the doorways you choose to enter. I know. You've heard this speech before. More times possibly than one cares to mention. Watch out for the drugs, alcohol, the wild parties, and mindless sexual encounters. Mom, Dad, Big Brother or Sister have probably hammered those warnings into your head about a million and half times. I won't be next to preach to you.

I will say those opportunities do exist at UNCW. Whether you choose those passageways or one less dangerous it's your choice and none of my business. That is one of many decisions you will have to make on your own now. It's part of the new freedom one receives the second after waving good-byes and screaming "I love you" as the family truckster pulls away from the residence hall's curb and disappears in the distance.

I can still see my mother's face, staring at me out the window of our ugly brown station wagon. She fought back the tears because she promised her son she wouldn't cry in his presence. For some freshmen, the freedom from your parental unit will be a godsend. To others your parents' departure will be a tearful emotional separation. It's part of growing up and being independent. Your parents deep down know this. They realized they have to let go of you no matter how hard it hurts.

College is a place where mistakes and wrong turns are made everyday. It is a testing ground for life. A trial period seasoned with classes, parties, work, and good times. Through three years at this institution I've made my share of gaffes, blunders, and bonehead plays. I've learned you have to study and go to classes everyday.

I've found you can't do research by just walking by the library, you actually have to go into it. As a journalist I've discovered that words are a powerful weapon that often can blow up in your face.

I've been both responsible and irresponsible. Astute and a stupid. Yet through it all I've enjoyed close friendships, knowledge, and success. I have also matured and gain a little experience along the way. It hasn't been a smooth ride but one worth the ticket to admission.

Which brings me to my original question: what can I tell you, the incoming freshmen about UNCW. Well here goes. Look at your hand. I mean real close. It is an amazing piece of equipment isn't it. It can palm a basketball and sending it swirling through space ala Michael(Jordan) and Magic (Johnson).

It can hurl a baseball at speeds at or over 100 miles and hour like a Nolan Ryan. It can steady the legs and body of a Greg Louganis, as he spins, twist, and turns his body toward the earth in search of the perfect dive. It can toss a serve, snare a line drive, and throw a bomb.

It can also be raised to ask or answer a question.

It allows you to express your feelings, opinions, and ideas. If used frequently it will get you involved. If ignored it can also cause you trouble. That's my advice, I guess. Get involved with the people and the activities around you. Enjoy your collegiate years before they're gone. That's the position I find myself three wonderful years later. Entering my final pre-season training before the real game of life begins. Man, have the years sailed by quickly.

So what can I tell you, the newcomer to this institution of higher learning? What confidence can I install? The answer was in my silence as I sat leaning on my Fuji ten-speed at 2 a.m. in the morning in the center of campus.

But if my mom asks, remember I was sound asleep at that hour.

Miller Named New Athletic Director

by Patrick Fowler
Sports Editor

After eight months of interviews, late night discussions, and endless hours of debate, the athletic directorship of the University of North Carolina at Wilmington came down to one name and a phone call. UNCW Chancellor James Leutze placed the call and assistant to the president of athletics at Louisiana Tech, Paul Miller, picked up the phone.

And with that UNCW appointed only the second athletic director in its history. The official confirmation of Miller was made last Wednesday in Golden Hawk room in Trask Coliseum. The announcement also officially closed the final chapter in a 40-year career of former A.D. William J. Brooks. Brooks served 33 years in the position and ends his ties with the university on June 30. Miller who signed a five-year 70,000 package, moves in July 1.

"This might be the happiest day of my life, along with my family," Miller said. "We're very excited about coming to this area to work. We're especially excited about coming to a school with an international leader in Jim Leutze and the opportunity to work at an institution like the University of North Carolina at Wilmington."

The new athletic director, known for his open-door policy and aggressiveness, wasted no time getting involved in UNCW athletics. Miller, with approval from Provost and Vice Chancellor D. Charles Cahill and outgoing A.D. Brooks, promoted Seahawk assistant baseball coach Mark Scalf to the top job June 7, a little over week after former skipper Bobby Guthrie announced his resignation from the post on May 28. Scalf, who has been an assistant for eight seasons with UNCW expressed his approval of the committee selection of Miller.

"Paul is perceptive and he has great ideas," Miller said. "Once you get to know Paul, he is easy to talk to. I think he will be a plus for our program but you have to see coach Brooks get out."

The search for the UNCW athletic directorship began Oct. 19 following Mr. Brooks announcement that he would be retiring at the end of the academic year. A eight-person search committee consisting of athletic faculty members and administration personnel was immediately formed.

Associate math professor Ken Gurganus chaired the committee as the job vacancy was advertised in that athletic weekly publication The NCAA News. 160 applicants applied for the post and by mid May the search committee had whittled the list to three finalists; Miller, North Carolina State associate athletic director Nora Finch, and East Carolina assistant athletic director Jim Bass.

Second and third interviews of the remaining candidates were conducted over a three week time period. The committee then submitted their top two picks to Dr. Leutze for his final recommendation to the Board of Trustees. Dr. Leutze presented his selection to the Board's monthly meeting at Camp Lejeune Air Base in Jacksonville, N.C.

The Board of Trustees took no time in approving and appointing Miller to the A.D. post. Dr. Leutze called Mr. Miller the same day with the job offer.

"I would like to underline my delight at Paul becoming a part of the university and the community," Leutze said. "He brings a great deal of experience and integrity to the position. He understands that we are here as an educational institution and that sports are vital, but the students are here primarily for an education. We are confident that he will do a fine job for the university."

Miller brings an impressive work record to UNCW. The 51-year old West Virginian has 15 years of experience in athletic administration. Miller has also served eight years as an associate athletic director at West Virginia (75-82) and Louisiana Tech Universities ('86-90), and four years as athletic director at LTU. The past year LTU promoted Miller from his A.D. post to assistant to the president of athletics.

Mr. Miller has two children, Paul (23) and Ann (21), and a wife Marie. Miller claimed his family played a big part in his decision to apply and finally accepted the UNCW A.D. post.

"We really like the area," Miller said. "We have been trying to get to the Carolinas for 15-16 years. When this job opened up, it was like a dream come true."

But don't expect the athletic director's head to be in the clouds. Miller is determined to run a program that stresses education first and athletics second.

"In the last 15 years at Louisiana Tech we have graduated 92 percent of our men's basketball players," Miller said. "We are here to compete, play a good schedule and win as many games as we can but the product we turn out will have college degrees."

UNCW currently has a 76 percent athletic graduation rate over a five-year period. The men's basketball team graduated 50 percent of its four-year recruits.

Outgoing A.D., Bill Brooks promised he wouldn't be watching the progress of the new athletic director once he steps down from a post he has held for 33 years.

"I'll be here if the university needs me but I won't be peering over anybody's shoulder," Brooks said. "I have been responsible for the direction of this institution for 40 years. . . it's somebody else's turn."

Come July 1, it's Miller time.

It's Miller Time!

New Athletic Director Paul Miller addresses members of the media last Wednesday. Miller is only the second athletic director in UNCW history. He assumes the post July 1.

Have A "Ball" At UNCW Summer Camps

by Patrick Fowler
Sports Editor

School has been out for only two weeks and there's nothing to do. You've been to the movie theater, roller skating rink, and local amusement park about a half a million times. You want something new but affordable. The solution to your problems may be in the summer sports camps sponsored by the University of North Carolina at Wilmington's athletic department.

UNCW is currently offering camps in six sporting areas, basketball (men's and women's), baseball, soccer, tennis, volleyball, and track and field. The camps are taught and supervised by the Seahawks varsity coaches and their assistants. Coaches drill campers on the basics of their individual sport and offer advanced instruction for the immediate players.

The camps, although some session required older students, are open to players between the ages of 8-17. Camps are held from mid June to late July. Different sports holding their camps at various intervals to insure all participants are able to use all the facilities available to them.

Camps also offered students the opportunity to live on campus during their week or weeks of instruction.

Campers wishing to stay on campus will be housed in air-conditioned residence halls within walking distance of the fields. Students will be fed 14 meals prepared by athletic dietitians and dine in the university new cafeteria, Wagoner Hall. Day cost for camps are $150 a session, $210 if participants elect to live on campus. All players receive a camp T-shirt, notebook, and lunch and dinner. Certain sports, like baseball, pass out week-ending awards and hold night team vs. team competition.

Interested? Sign up for the sports are still going on. Order forms can be picked up in the athletic office located in Trask Coliseum. One can have the information on the camps send to you by calling the UNCW athletic department at 395-3232. Below is a listing of the dates, age requirements, and sports director of the summer camps offered to kids. Have a ball.

Hey Kids, What Time Is It?! Do You Know?

It's Time To Pump Up and Air Out!

One never knows who will show up at UNCW summer camps. Four years ago, Chicago Bulls forward, Michael Jordan helped kids learn the fundamentals of basketball. Now he is teaching them to the Los Angeles Lakers in the N.B.A. Finals.

Cahill Names

by Patrick Fowler
Sports Editor

In a month which saw five managerial changes in the major leagues, the University of North Carolina at Wilmington named a new man to guide the '91-92 Seahawks next spring season. Provost Dr. Charles Cahill announced June 7, in the Golden Hawk room, that eight-year assistant coach Mark Scalf will be taking over the reins following the departure of former head coach Bobby Guthrie.

Guthrie, 38, resigned May 27 stating that changes needed to be made and the desire to pursue other career opportunities.

"After evaluating three of the last four years, I'm not satisfied with our record," Guthrie said. "We have always been successful, but I want to see the program step up another notch. I have never been able to handle the losing part of the position. We've had some potential the last couple of years, but just haven't gotten to where I thought we should be. It's time for someone else to take over and take us up a notch."

Guthrie assumed the post on Feb. 25, 1983 from athletic director William J. Brooks. Over eight seasons with the Seahawks, Guthrie compiled a 205-205-1 record and was voted Coach-of-the-Year

Scalf New Seahawk Skipper

In 1989, his teams have captured two Colonial Conference titles ('87-'89), three 30+ win seasons (85, 87, 89), and averaged 25.6 victories a year. The Seahawks (25-27, 11-11 CAA) finished their '91 campaign second in the conference behind Richmond.

Scalf, 32, lettered four years at UNCW during the late 70's. He earned his bachelor's degree in 1980 and his master's degree two years later from Chapel Hill. Scalf was a graduate assistant for the Tar Heels in '81 before moving to a full assistant "Ever since I decided to get into the profession, I've always wanted to possibly return here and be head coach."

Mark Scalf

New Head Baseball Coach

position one year later as UNC won the regular Atlantic Coast Conference Championship. Scalf arrived back to help coach his alma mater in '84. Dr. Cahill expressed his confidence in his decision to promote Scalf from assistant to head coach.

"Mark has done a fine job during his tenure as an assistant coach, and we believe this decision will provide a smooth transition for the program," Cahill said. "We are confident that Mark will provide the excellent brand of baseball we have here at Wilmington."

Scalf's strengths lie in his recruiting ability. The new skipper is responsible for obtaining five All-Conference players. One of them, Trent Mongero, captured CAA Player-of-the-Year honors in '89. The other four are Chuck Jones, Bryant Balentine, and current Seahawks Mark Chamberlin and Perry Curin. In addition former UNCW players, Mongero, Jones, Balentine, Tommie Adams, and Tony Tillman have signed professional contracts.

The new head coach also has a jump on next season having already inked two high school recruits by late May. Scalf, excited at the opportunity to finally manage a program feels that capturing the league championship next season isn't out of reach.

"Ever since I got into the profession I've always wanted to possibly return here and be head coach," Scalf said. "I appreciate the opportunity Bobby Guthrie afforded me and the responsibility he placed on me the last eight years. I'd like to see us at the top of the league and don't feel like that's an extreme. We have the players in the program, along with some recruited players, who should help us be in a position to challenge for the No. 1 spot in the league."

Enrollment Tops 8000

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor In Chief

UNCW is over-enrolled for the fall semester.

Bob Fry, director of Institutional Research reported enrollment to be 8,009 as of Tuesday, but he said that the final figures are as yet unknown. University administration expected to enroll only 7300 students.

Fry credited most of the large numbers to an unexpectedly large group of freshmen, and transfer students who chose to enroll. UNCW was expecting about 1300 freshmen for the fall semester. That figure was exceeded by 257 students as of Tuesday. About 900 transfer students enrolled, exceeding the projected 550.

Fry said that perspective students who had been accepted to attend this semester were late in putting down tuition deposits.

The university began sending out acceptance letters as early as last October. However, the accepted students were allowed to postpone sending in the tuition deposit until June 1.

The small quantity of tuition deposits received through the winter and early spring was low enough to lead administrators to believe that enrollment would be below the expected numbers, Fry said. In order to meet the enrollment projections, the university sent acceptance letters to more students.

The problem came when a mass of tuition deposits were received between mid-April and the first of May.

Fry said that the projections were based on the statistical indicators available, but called the spring projections "conservative." "You have to over-accept" students," Fry said. "It's like over-booking an airplane."

But, according to Admissions Director Diane Zeeman, accepted students can't be bumped.

After students have been accepted, and send in their tuition deposits, the university is required by contract to enroll them, Zeeman said.

Administrators are looking for the reasons for the late rush of students deciding to attend UNCW. "That's the $64,000 question," said Fry.

Fry said that the university will conduct a survey study to find out how prospective students go through the enrollment process when they choose a school. He said that the university will contact students now enrolled at UNCW as well as applicants who decided against enrolling here.

Last year UNCW began a new "revolving admission" program which allowed students to be informed of acceptance into the university within a few weeks of applying. UNCW also started a more ambitious recruiting plan which involved making personal calls to prospective students encouraging them to choose UNCW. "The plan simply worked too well," Zeeman said.

Housing Is Filled

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

As the year progresses, the parking situation should improve. "During the first few weeks, students are still figuring out where to park."

Of the approximately 2,425 commuter decals have been sold and 1,240 resident decals have been sold to UNCW's 1,958 residents. Vehicles without decals risk a $15 fine and Robison hopes this will get students in to buy a decal.

Decals were slated to go up to $72, which was later rescinded by the Board of Trustees upon request from Chancellor James Leutze. "Leutze wanted to look into the funds and it could be done," said Robison. She also said it is something that was put off and cannot be avoided in the future.

Robison encourages students to buy decals. "Campus police don't want to write tickets. The parking office wants people to buy decals. We want to protect people that buy decals."

Because of the increased number of freshmen and the number of students returning to on-campus housing, dorm rooms are booked with triple occupancy. Double rooms are serving as makeshift dorm rooms for students. These "triple" rooms can be found in Belk, Graham and Hewlett Halls and the double-occupancy suites.

The year started with 127 triples and 49 have been moved. Charles Maimone, Director of Housing and Food Services, anticipates that 28 triples will be moved by the end of the week, bringing the number of triple occupancy rooms down to 50. Maimone said he hoped the whole situation would be cured by Spring Semester.

The occupants of the room were told either they were the third person in a room or that there would be one in advance. When a space becomes available, they will be moved into a permanent residence. Until the tripling situation is cured, all the occupants are rewarded credit in their room account by the Housing Office. The Housing Office anticipates that some people with no credit hours will not show, others will find different ways to make up the credit. Spaces are given to the occupants, calls are made to verify that these spaces will not be occupied and records are checked.

Although students tend to think that overbooking means more money, Maimone said that is just a myth. "It actually costs more. Beds had to be bought; desks had to be bought; furniture had to be bought for these people." The total cost for the extra furniture was $85,000. As well as furniture, utilities costs went up for the buildings.

Because of the situation, some plans that Housing had changed. For instance, Hewlett Hall was slated to be closed to decrease

Enrollment Results In Crowded Parking Lots

BY CAROLE MEHLE

Convenient parking has become a thing of the past on campus — for students and staff. Traffic on campus is up because of an increase in attendance.

The problem is not a shortage of spaces but inconvenience for those using the parking lots, Sergeant W.D. Howell of Campus Police said.

"There is no shortage of parking spaces on campus," said Howell. "These parking spaces may be located inconveniently, but they are there. Students need to get used to parking not for convenience, but where spaces are available. This means they will have to walk to get where they want to go," he said.

Some of the parking problems have involved parking lots around Cameron and Morton Halls. Students have been parking in staff spaces either to wait on others or to go to classes. Parking on grass in front of residence halls was also a problem during moving days.

Though that problem has faded, illegal use of designated handicapped parking spaces has not. "There is a $50 campus-wide fine for this violation. The auto fee, which can be issued, is $65. But we try to work with the university."

Traffic enforcement has just begun to get rigid. Howell said the police will enforce stop and speed laws. "Rolling is not a stop," he said.

Howell stressed the importance of students reading the literature on "Traffic Rules and Regulations" given to them upon purchase of the parking decal. Points stressed in boldface print are: 1) the campus is "considered a pedestrian campus;" 2) Traffic rules apply at all times; 3) lack of space or lack of convenient space is not considered a valid excuse for violation; and 4) restricted areas of parking and restricted hours for residents were pointed out.

Howell also stressed that students need to pay attention and move slowly while driving on campus. "Students react slower and don't pay as much attention when a car radio is on. They don't realize a car weighs 3,000 pounds." Although he said there have been few wrecks, Howell advises students to "drive defensively, read your information, and pay attention."

Both Howell and Margaret Robison, director of auxiliary services, agreed that looking at signs is important. She also said students reading their traffic literature helps because they will come to understand the rules better before they get a ticket. "We try to make the information available to them."

Robison feels that there are no more problems or complaints than usual. Even with an increased population, she sees the traffic situation as "going smoothly."

Search For Rapist Continues Campus Police Say They Have Leads

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor In Chief

Campus Police are continuing their search for a man who raped two women on the UNCW campus Aug. 16. A police sketch was composed based on the description of the man given by the two women. The composite was released to the public on Aug. 20.

Lt. Charlie Willis of campus police said that the composite is not the only lead campus police are following. "Information continues to flow," he said. "And we are chasing down every lead."

The Wilmington City Police were called in on the night of the rape to examine the crime scene, but the investigation has now been turned over to Campus Police, Willis said.

"[The Wilmington police] are helping us in every way they can... but it is our investigation," he said.

As to the success of the investigation so far, he said, "We're still in the ball game."

One of the victims is a Residence Life staff member who was preparing for the arrival of freshmen the next morning. The other women was not a UNCW student.

The women reported that as they were leaving a room on campus, the assailant forced them back from the hallway into the room. He then raped both women and left the scene. He then raped both women and left the scene. Both said the rapist was armed with a knife.

Letter From The Chancellor Welcome Back To UNCW

BY JAMES R. LEUTZE
Chancellor of UNCW

Welcome Back!

Throughout my career in higher education, I have always felt a sense of excitement and renewal with the start of a new academic year. There's a sense of freshness — new books, new professors, clean grade book, new subjects to study.

In particular this year I'm pleased to be joining you in the class room. I'm teaching History 292, a course I developed on "Wilmington: A Study in Development." So, in the truest sense, we are all starting this semester with new perspectives and new opportunities.

We are particularly happy to welcome a record number of international students. They are part of the effort to make this a more diverse community since contact with professors and students from different backgrounds is part of the educational experience.

As I welcome the new freshmen, transfers, returning students, and other members of the university community, I urge you to remember one thing... faculty, staff, and administrators are here for one purpose — to help you succeed in your college career. I recall what one of the candidates for athletic director said last year: our purpose is not to see if the admissions office made a mistake when you were admitted, we are here to help you graduate.

James R. Leutze

That philosophy underlies the spirit you will find here at UNCW. When there are problems, let someone know. Talk with your professors and get to know them outside of the classroom. They are a wonderful group, truly dedicated to education.

If you have an idea for a better way to do something, use the new suggestion box in the University Center. Your comments will be read and evaluated. Those ideas with merit will be rewarded and implemented.

Communication is at the heart of preventing misunderstandings from blossoming into full-fledged problems. To this end, my door is open. I have established student hours — for this fall they are as follows:

Monday, September 9: 3-5pm;
Thursday, September 19: 9:30-11:30am;
Wednesday, September 25: 3-5pm;
Thursday, October 3: 9:30-11:30am;
Wednesday, October 30: 3-5pm;
Thursday, November 7: 9:30-11:30am;
Monday, November 11: 3-5pm;
Thursday, November 21: 9:30-11:30am; Monday, December 2: 3-5pm.

Another avenue for communicating your concerns is Dr. David Miller, who for the first time this year has assumed the position of enrollment manager. His job is to take down roadblocks, whether it's uncomplimentary course mix-ups or pointing you in the right direction for help in study tips. You can call him at 395-3540.

Again welcome to UNCW, one of the finest young universities in the nation. My best wishes for your success.

costs. Other housing changes included Galloway Hall becoming a girls residence hall and Belk Hall becoming a co-ed hall. "Basically, the male spaces in Galloway were moved to Belk and the girls spaces in Belk were moved to Galloway," said Maimone. This change was brought about by greater demand from women for all female housing.

Maimone also said that more upper classmen are returning. 850 upper classmen are returning from the 1750 residents of last year. Most of the residents are returning.

We asked college students what they expected from a bank.

"I don't write many checks, but sometimes only a check will do, so I'll need a checkbook."

"I want to be able to withdraw cash 365 days and nights a year, and from time to time I'd like to check my balance over the phone."

"Hey, don't expect me to keep a minimum balance in my account."

Then we listened to what they had to say.

With information in hand, we set out to design a special account for students. And, we included what you asked for and a little more. Then we made sure the price was reasonable and access to your money would always be convenient. The result, a perfect account for college students. Its called Wachovia's Economy Checking.

Easy access to your money, day and night.

The first thing you'll receive is a Banking Card that allows you to withdraw money from any Wachovia Teller II® machine in North Carolina and the Plus System® or Relay® automated teller machines (ATM) almost anywhere. Next we added Phone Access® so you can check balances, transfer money from one account to another, find out if a check has cleared or when a deposit was posted to your account. Using Phone Access is as easy as using any telephone anytime day or night.

Best of all, it costs just $4.00 per month.

With 12 withdrawals by check or from any Teller II and no minimum balance requirement, you'll be sure to get your money's worth. In addition, you can call Phone Access as often as 5 times a month. Free. And, each month you'll receive a complete statement detailing your account activity. We even record and retain your cancelled checks for safekeeping.

Tips For Designing Your "New Room"

I enjoy the sea and its shore. I particularly enjoy saving nest seashells. One of my favorite shells is one that I have never found myself but which I purchased and put it in an honored place in my home. It is the chambered nautilus. As we begin this next semester of a new year, the chamber nautilus provides an image that is relevant to the opportunities that lie before us.

The chambered nautilus is fairly large, some six inches or more, and is one continuous spiral. The specimens I find most exciting are cut in half to show the whole suite of empty chambers with their pearly inner walls. Somewhere in the South Pacific or the Indian Ocean a mollusk built this marvelous shell around its body. And as this mysterious sea creature grew, it moved from chamber to chamber, sealing off the old one it had outgrown as it moved to a new and bigger one. But this one, too, grew too small and forced its mason and inmate to build again and move on.

Year after year beheld the silent that spread his lustrous coil; still as the spiral grew, He left the past year's dwelling for the new.

Stole with soft step its shining archway through, Built up its idle door, Stretched in its last-found home, and knew the old no more.

These lines are from a poem from Oliver Wendell Holmes, "The Chambered Nautilus". Many who begin this year, particularly new students, are and feel like that small soft shell fish. We are moving from a "room" (chamber) that has grown too small. We are leaving behind the "room" populated by family and familiar friends, safe and secure patterns for our lives that we have lived out over the years and familiar ways of thinking about ourselves and our lives. That "room" has grown too small for us and now the time has come to create a new and larger "room" for our becoming selves.

This new "room" is ours to create and design (and I'm talking a lot more than about our dorm or apartment room). What lies before us is new relationships, new thoughts, clarity about values and goals, and a growing sense of our own unique identity. Our new "room" is fraught with possibilities. It is a place for new dreams and hopes and, also, for the hard work it takes to make these dreams and hopes into a "room" that feels good and right for us.

But many of us have times when we feel very vulnerable in this transition from one "room" to a new one. We may hesitate to close off access to the past "room" with family, friends and community; yet, if our building is going to be successful, some letting go of the past is necessary and inevitable. We, like that small mollusk, are designed by our creator to grow and develop and expand as persons. Building this next chamber for this university period of our lives is both exciting and scary but filled with promise.

I hope and pray that you will take this opportunity to build your new chamber with enthusiasm, with determination to deal with the temptation to move back to your old "room" and with some measure of intentionality. There are lots of folks here that want to support you as you grow. I am one of them. If you'd ever like to sit down and have a conversation about the problems and promise of "chamber building", give me a call. I am Bob Hayward and can be reached at 799-8497. I work full time here as campus minister at the University and would enjoy getting to meet and talk with you.

I hope the chamber you are building will be as beautiful a that of the chambered nautilus.

Parking Problems Require Cooperation

Parking.

It's the perennial theme of complaints on campuses across the country. UNCW is certainly no exception.

Is there a parking problem at UNCW? There is if you consider cars backed up to Riegel Road because someone is waiting for a space beside the Union a problem. There's a parking problem when you can't get through the parking lot because it is full of idling cars waiting on an open space. There's something wrong with the parking when students can't get to class on time because there wasn't a space within a one minute walk of their building.

"You're late," said the teacher.

"There wasn't a parking space," said the student.

The last time we checked with the parking office, there was a space for everybody. The last time we looked over beside Trask, there were dozens of empty parking spaces. The same with the lots near the cafeteria. So why couldn't Johnny (or Joanie if you really must) find a space?

Is it because Johnny doesn't want to walk a mile or more to class? Is that the parking problem?

It appears that the problem is not one of parking, but one of parkers. In particular, the problem is parkers who don't want to walk a little to get to class. Admittedly, no one likes problems such as asthma or back injuries that may prohibit such activity. But most of the folks we see jockeying for a front row space or blocking traffic waiting for classes to end are young, healthy college students. They are robust, full of life and vigor.

The fact is, most of these people are just too lazy to walk. They are too wishy-washy to get rained on occasionally. They are too inconsiderate to think about the people behind them who have classes to get to also, and who might be willing to park in another lot... if they could get through to one. As long as parking is set up as it is, these people will continue to snarl traffic and block parking lots. There will still be a parking problem.

Fortunately The Seahawk has a few ideas to alleviate the parking problem. We have suggested for two years now that parking stickers be sold for different lots at prices relative to the proximity of class buildings. As each lot sells out, no more stickers will be sold for it. Seniors should have first option and so on down the line. There would be an opportunity to get cheaper parking as well as the option to pay a little more and park right in front of the class. There would still be some disgruntled students, but you can't please everybody.

Given the apparent lack of interest this idea has drawn from planners, we have another, more drastic but certainly effective idea. We can bulldoze all of the buildings, trees, shruberies, and other random freestanding objects. Then we'll level the ground, carving it about four inches deep, except at the edges and eight foot intervals where a narrow trench will run to about twenty four inches. Over this we'll lay plastic, followed by 2x4 wire fencing. Then we can pour concrete, yard after yard, until the entire campus is one huge parking lot. Classes will have to be held outside of course, maybe on the hoods of cars; and inclement weather may disrupt the occasional professor's syllabus — but you can't please everybody.

A beloved acquaintance of mine, Bilbo Baggins, esq., once passed on a tidbit of ancestral wisdom. "Never laugh at live dragons," he said.

I found this to be a sound maxim which apparently bears repeating.

As hurricane Bob passed by each projected target, people began to laugh and joke about the storm, and the panic it caused among the populace. Radio personalities made wise cracks as they suggested that the storm was safely passed, even while it churned only one hundred miles or so to the northeast.

Dragons, born in Bilbo's day, were considered fickle, and quite whimsical. Their moods swung randomly, but anger was always only a thought away. The same goes for hurricanes. Naysayers doubted that Diana would land in the Carolinas, but she did—twice. After apparently deciding to take her wrath elsewhere, she circled back and struck again. Someone must have laughed behind her back.

Forty two years ago, Hazel seemed to have abandoned her intention of a Cape Fear landfall and turned her course seaward. In the middle of the night, riding on the high tide, she returned, lashing beaches with a vengeance that almost seemed sentient. Even after the mythical Gray Man made his appearance, some doubter must have chuckled.

Obviously, Bob didn't come back, but the Hobbit's epigram is still valid. It has not reached a conclusion until the rotund female bursts forth in a melodious outpouring of rhythmic verbiage.

Many people laughed at the apparently fading specter of the "Red Menace". We cheered at the symbolic felling of the Berlin Wall. We applauded as one by one, Soviet republics gained independence. We saw the Soviet media openly criticize the government, and lauded Gorbachev for exposing to the world the atrocities committed by Joseph Stalin which had been denied for over fifty years. A mega-sigh of relief was breathed liners who opposed this change gathered their forces. Many of these, including the army and the secret police, objected to the loss of power and control they once wielded. Under the old regime, these forces would never have had to put up with mass demonstrations and protests over poor living conditions. A simple show of force, such as rolling tanks through the streets, or shooting a few civilians would have been sufficient to quell these uprisings. . . . And with the media tightly controlled by the risk of redundancy) Never laugh at live dragons.

If you even had to ask what world events have to do with you, you are laughing in the face of a very large, very live dragon. Don't feel so insulated from these things, because that safety you take so for granted is ephemeral at best. Those of you who are recently moved from home; Mom and Dad aren't going to be there to tape the windows or pay for the flood damage when a hurricane blows through your lives. Those of you graduating, it is your potential jobs that will disappear if the recession comes back or worsens due to events in that great big world outside the sheltered confines of the university.

Even in these "hallowed halls" the dragons of outside influence can wreak havoc. Witness recent cuts in financial aid and increases in tuition. And the dragons are myriad. They are not all as large as the Soviet Union. Many are tiny creatures, scarcely larger than an iguana. They may pose no threat until you laugh at them and see them as insignificant.

Schoolwork is one of these "fire lizards". Laugh at it and find yourself on the street, working a blue-collar job for minimum wage instead of in that high paying white collar position you had dreamed of. The dragons go right on up in size. There are drugs and alcohol, STD's, AIDS, rape, and still more.

There are some dragons you can control, and others that are beyond the scope of your powers. Do what you can to slay them, one by one. But never, ever laugh at them while they are still alive.

Laugh at schoolwork and find yourself on the street, working a blue-collar job instead of that white collar position you had dreamed of.

at the apparent end of the threat of catastrophic nuclear war.

But what the merry public was not seeing (and those who did see mainly ignored) was the strife brought on by the changes. Even in his death throes, a dragon is a formidable enemy.

As the republics gained independence, many found that they could not survive independent of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (although survival at any rate was a questionable and dubious proposition). The economy plummeted madly. Old ethnic wounds, ineffectually dressed by the old police state, festered again, and the afflicted sought redress from their old enemies. Gorbachev had given the people what they said they wanted, and many found that mere freedom was not the panacea they had expected.

On top of this, the hard state, no news of this would have leaked out to enrage the international community. Ah, the good old days. . . when people suffered oppression and starved in peace. . .

But that dragon was supposed to have been slain. Like St. George with his lance, Gorbachev had put an end to that. Yet, even as it convulsed at the threshold of death, it was not finished. We turned our backs, sniggering, and the dragon rose up, wounded, but not dead. Gorbachev was briefly deposed, removed from office by the hard line factions of his party. The short lived coup d'etat only served as a reminder that he who laughs last, etc. Even now, it would be unwise to consider the red dragon of communism dead.

What do these two, obviously unrelated items have to do with us, college students facing a semester of toil and tribulation? Merely this. . . (at

Get Involved!

It's Sermon Time Once Again

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor in Chief

It probably wouldn't be argued by many that the students of UNCW have a less than exemplary record when it comes to involvement in campus activities. Everyone tries to coax students into getting involved — the university officials try; the SGA is in the midst of a large push for student involvement; individual clubs and organizations on campus try; and we at The Seahawk have tried.

At the beginning of a school year students are always overloaded with publicity and advertisements from every student organization under the sun. I must admit that I myself have contributed to the deluge of material on the walls of the Hallowed Halls, and in the mail boxes of many students.

But, believe it or not, there really are some simple ways to choose which activities are for you — and they don't require you to sift through that fifty pound stack of pamphlets on your desk.

The best way to get to know the campus is by talking. Talk to people who know what is going on. Talk to your R.A.'s; talk to the people in Student Government; talk to Kathy Birmingham in the Leadership Center; talk to Brock Snyder in the Outdoor Discoveries Center; talk to Laniia Hanson in the Student Activities office; or just talk to the nearest person wearing Greek letters. But find out what this university has to offer you. Believe me — there's more to it than going to class, hanging out in your dorm or apartment, and looking for a beer connection.

There are some very simple ways to find the activity for you.

I also know of another way you can get involved which doesn't take much of your time at all (here comes the plug). A great way to let others know how you feel about what is going on around campus is to write a letter to the editor in The Seahawk.

How do you feel about having to wait in the parking lots competing for a space? How do you feel about being in overcrowded classes? What do you think of (sorry Curtis) the student body president spending $500 of your money to put a statue in the student government office? What do you think about the food in the caf?

You can drop us a line (using the guidelines in the box at the top of this page) and we'll get your word out to others.

Everybody deserves to see their names in the paper at least once. Don't let your's appear only in the obituaries. Do something now.

Here endeth the sermon. . . for now.

Boyz N The Hood Is Worth Looking Into

By Zachary Blaseky
Entertainment Writer

Thirty-three wounded, one dead.

I hardly knew what to expect from the film Boyz n the Hood (now playing at New Center Cinema), which has generated such violence at theaters across the country. I, as presumably most who were unfamiliar with the film's content, visualized a belabored narrative depicting gruesome combat among the street gangs of Los Angeles. In other words, another Colors.

What I discovered, thankfully, was altogether different from my assumptions. In its earnest film debut about the black family coming of age in South-Central LA, 23 year old writer/director John Singleton presents a series of moral issues that black adolescents are forced to confront, such as marriage, sex, peer pressure, violence, racism, drugs, education and religion. Unlike most films that illustrate "cinematic teens" dealing with these issues, Boyz, leaves no semblance of an impotent, feel-good movies coupled with only a few "token blacks".

No, this all-black film, based on Singleton's childhood in LA, is realistically fresh and powerful, leaving out the unnecessary violence one might expect. The repetitious racial issue of Black vs. White is also absent; with the entire focus being on the impoverished black community, you leave the theater feeling as though you've gained a realistic and alarming understanding of what it's truly like being poor and black in LA suburbia where everyone is searching for a way out. One more distinctiveness the film carries is that there are neither good nor bad guys, allowing the viewer to concentrate on the vital issues at hand, rather than fruitless macho rivalry.

A passionate Cuba Gooding Jr. plays the lead role as Trey, a precocious 18-year old who learns to make ethical decisions regarding sex and violence with help from his probing and perceptive father, Furious Styles, played by Larry Fishburne. An excellent, razor-sharp performance is made by Ice Cube as Doughboy, the street-smart authority among his neighborhood pals.

In addition to his heavy-duty performance on screen, Ice Cube provides some of the most effective music for the film. Additional musical performances that add vitality are by Kool Moe Dee, and Run DMC. Unfortunately, the hard hitting rap music is plagued by intervals of sultry new-age jazz that would correspond better with some sappy love scene in General Hospital than with the dozens of stalwart scenes this movie offers.

The only evidence of Singleton's inexperience as a filmmaker lies in the filming itself. Several of the turning points in the narrative are anti-climactic and forecasted much too far in advance. Also, many of the camera angles and panning suggest novice and rudimentary film making.

Despite the few aforementioned shortcomings, this is a good film. And what really makes it work is its ability to portray a sincerely fresh and realistic representation of Black America. Today, the majority of images illustrated through cinema and television of LA's black culture have been ones merely of gang violence. Boyz achieves something distinctly different. It takes a subjective look at the people themselves: their family, friends, enemies and most importantly, their culture. If you're thirsting for one summer film that captures these innovative and thought-provoking subjects, you won't be disappointed. However, if you wish to be entertained by the tiresome, trashy, physical violence that so many embody, my only suggestion would be Schwarzenegger or Van Damme.

Yes, But Can He Juggle Classes, Work And A Dangerous Machete?

By RaMona Hupp
Arts & Entertainment Editor

Who can spin two balls on one finger? Who can spell thoughts with those giant rings that closely resemble spearpoint Lifesavers? "Oooohhhh!" Who can give you a 3-D juggling effect (Dangerous machete, Difficult bowling ball and a Delicious apple) without the aid of those stupid looking glasses?

If you went to the totally free ACE sponsored event at the University Center Friday night, then

Like, what is the meaning of life? How many teeth are on a chain saw? And my personal favorite: Why do men have nipples? You could have also seen the Amazing Curtis (a/k/a Curtis Wilson, our SGA President) spin a "big red ball" on each finger, while one of those Lifesaver® things rotated around

Did You Know?
Humphrey Bogart's immortalized role of "Rick" from the movie Casablanca almost went to another actor by the name of Almond Reagan! (The mind reels at the ramifications!)

Did You Care?

ACE Is At It Again

That wacky bunch over in the ACE office are at it again. Just last week they brought you the group Valence, who performed at the Gazebo (behind campus apartments). Then scarcely over twenty-four hours later they were at it again with comedian Edward Jackman performing in the University Center. And they have just established an amateur jam sessions on Tuesday evenings at the Center Stage Cafe. And you can be sure they won't stop there.

Most of the events are free and on campus. The money that ACE works with is, in part, coming out of the student fees you paid. The more support through ideas and help they get from you the more they can do. They will also be responsible for planning the homecoming festivities.

And with ANY organization on campus Don't be a stranger. We are only as productive as you allow us to be. (End of sermon.)

Do you endlessly hum theme songs from movies or television shows to the point of annoyance for your family and friends?

Are you dismayed over Dave (120 Minutes) Kendall's new topper?

Can you name all of the Brady's?

Do you ponder the relevancy of a society without entertainment?

If so, you are just what The Seahawk's Arts & Entertainment Department is looking for. Come by and see us. (Room 203-E, U.U.)

Renting A Video Tonight?

Edward Scissorhands- Tim Burton's ultimate journey into weirdom. This movie possess the magical stuff only fairy tales are made of. Watch it with a light heart, an open mind and a box of tissues.

The Grifters- This is one of the nicest surprises in a long line of "blind video renting". The story will have you going to the very end. Great performances!

Home Alone- Am I the only one on this planet who hasn't seen this movie? Turn on the air-conditioner. Pull out some Christmas decorations and pretend it's December.

Awakenings- Get out the hankies. This tear jerker, directed by Penny Marshall, contains stellar performances by Robin Williams and Robert DeNiro.

Quote Of The Week

"When I was growing up, Top 40 radio was always uneven, but that's what was neat about it. It was weirdly diverse. You had all styles of music... That's when radio was the cutting edge. Now TV is the cutting edge. The radio has become something you hear in your car, or something you hear while you're cleaning your house. In other words, it's background music, and that's a shame."

43rd Emmy Telecast Plagued By Boredom

By RaMona Hupp
Arts & Entertainment Editor

The 43rd Annual Emmy Awards show aired on our newly christened Fox station on Sunday night. And for those who couldn't quite tear themselves away from the Super Model of the Year Contest, here are some of the somewhat lackluster highlights.

Dennis Miller's (Saturday Night Live's ex-newscaster) opening seemed to get the show off on the right foot. And when James Earl Jones had a (staged) pie thrown in his face, well, it looked promising. But it wasn't long after that the show began to go slightly downhill. All I can say is thank God there weren't any musical numbers.

Jane Lee Curtis, who co-hosted along with Miller and Jerry Seinfeld, was correct in saying that no one watches these insipid award shows because they want to see who wins. They watch to see who has the most persuasive and intrepid designer. There were a few who crossed that fine line of style, but not the big fashion faux pas turn-out I was hoping for. So, what do you get when very few celebrities cross that trend-bender line? A very long three hours.

And then there was the sound problem. Fox lost all audio in the first half of the broadcast and never quite got it back. I just can't tell you how annoying it is when you can't hear your favorite stars make complete fools of themselves.

Unity seems to be the latest trend in Hollywood this year. All but a few united in wearing the red ribbons that symbolized the much needed support for those with AIDS. All the women banded together to promote short hemlines, and the "flip" (with their hair). Yeah, like you care.

Here are my own awards that should have been given out:

The "Oddest Couple"
Award- Richard (Mr. Neutotic) Lewis and Rob "Robo-Rob-in-the-Rob-meister" Schneider (Saturday Night Live's most annoying new character). Alright, who was in charge of the seating chart? I think "el" Rob-o" must have crashed the shin-dig, 'cause he showed up a little later next to Glenn Close.

The "we're so in love, it's sickening" Couple Award- To Kirk Cameron and his lovely wife (and past Growing Pains co-star) Chelsea. Everybody in unison now... "a-a-a-hh".

The "I've had so much plastic surgery that I can't shut my eyes" Award- goes to Alan Thicke (Growing Pains), who gets brownie points for trying to keep Crystal Bernard from totally falling on her butt in front of ten million people. Nice save, Al. A little late, but nice try.

The "worst possible choice of outer-wear" Award- Well, it was a tie. Jane Seymour certainly took the lead with her sequined/lycra leotard nightmare. But those Golden Girls came really close for their concerned, albeit nauseating effort. Honorable mention- Craig T. Nelson (Coach) who looked like he was attending a funeral... in the year of 1880.

The "best time for a bathroom break" Award- Too many to mention.

The "let it rest" Award- The boo-boo tribute to Michael Landon.

The "how long is the announcing of this category going to last?" Award- Best Writing for a Variety/Special. Who won? I fell asleep.

The "Hey, who counted the votes?" Award- The 63rd Annual Academy Awards Show. There is something slightly peculiar, if not somewhat nepotistic, about an award show giving another award show an award... not once, but twice!

The "does it honestly warrant air-time?" Award- The Editing for a Series/Multi-Camera Production Category. Maybe they were the lucky fools who drew the longest straw this year.

And now for the real winners:
Best Supporting Actress- Comedy: Bebe Neuwirth ("Lilith" of Cheers)

Best Supporting Actor- Comedy: Jonathan Winters (Davis Rules)

Best Lead Actress- Comedy: Kirstie Alley (Cheers)

Best Lead Actor- Comedy: Burr Reynolds (Evening Shade)

Best Series- Comedy: Cheers

Best Supporting Actress- Drama: Madge Sinclair (Gabriel's Fire)

Best Supporting Actor- Drama: Timothy Busfield (Thirtysomething)

Best Lead Actor- Drama: James Earl Jones (Gabriel's Fire)

Best Lead Actress- Drama: Patricia Wettig (Thirtysomething)

Best Drama Series- L.A. Law

Henry Donates Land For Station

From the office of University Relations

Wilmington, NC-- Troy Henry of Winnabow, NC has donated a 110-acre tract of prime coastal forest land in Brunswick County to the University of North Carolina at Wilmington to permit its perpetual conservation and eventual use as a Coastal Forest Research Station and Botanical Garden. Additional acreage of adjoining property will be given at a later date.

The announcement of the gift was made at the meeting of the UNCW Board of Trustees today when Henry was recognized by Chancellor James R. Leute and honored at a luncheon at the Madeline Suite of Wagoner Hall on campus.

Leute has listed environmental education as one of his five target goals for the university. He commented that this contribution will provide the resources to build a superior environmental sciences curriculum and will furnish the environment necessary to conduct long-term ecological research.

Bordered by Town Creek, the Henry property is about 10 miles southeast of Wilmington and is approached from Old Town Creek Road (1412) and Rock Creek Road (1411). It is about a 30-minute drive from UNCW.

According to UNCW biology professor Dr. Paul Hosier, the property contains outstanding natural resources and potentially important cultural resources. "Both from a natural and educational standpoint, the resources on the property are unique and valuable," Hosier said, nothing in particular the bottomland hardwood stand of numerous large cypress, black gum, sweetgum, and red maple.

The Henry property is about 10 miles southeast of Wilmington

"A hardwood forest of oak and hickory dominates the upland portion and is unique in this area," Hosier said. Usually found in the Piedmont and mountains, the hardwood forest will provide students a nearby opportunity for study of these species.

Even before turning over the deeds to the 110-acre tract, Henry has permitted UNCW biology faculty and students to use the property for study of plant and animal communities.

"The natural areas that currently exist on the property will be managed to perpetuate them as representatives of plant and animal communities in Southeastern North Carolina. Typically, as development has continued, it has become increasingly difficult for instructors to find representative natural areas for their students to study. These communities will remain undisturbed on the Henry property," Hosier said.

The university's long-term plans for the property include development of a botanical garden and arboretum of national prominence. Public education through field trips and interpretive walks is also envisioned. Management of the property will be the responsibility of the Biology Department.

A long-time Brunswick County resident, Troy Henry is a graduate of Bolivia High School, he earned a bachelor of arts degree in history from UNC Wilmington in March 1970, and he served in the U.S. Army. He is now retired from the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad and Federal Paperboard.

He decided to give the property to UNCW because of his desire to see it preserved and used for the education of the people of North Carolina and the Southeastern United States. In accordance with his wishes, use of the area will be guided by an emphasis on nature appreciation, nature observation, and nature education. The property given was settled in the late 18th century by John Basset-Evans, the great-grandfather of Troy Henry.

Scholarship Available

The "Wilber W. Kirk-LaQue Center Endowment Scholarship" was announced Thursday, August 1 at a dinner honoring Will Kirk upon retirement from the LaQue Center for Corrosion Technology, Inc., Wrightsville Beach, NC, after 30 years service. Established by colleagues, friends and Inco United States, Inc., the parent company of the LaQue Center, the scholarship will be awarded on a yearly basis to a second year student enrolled in the Marine Technology Department at Cape Fear Community College.

In making the announcement, Harold T. Michels, president of the LaQue Center, stated "We wanted to do something for Will that would be perpetual. The scholarship honors him for his contributions to business and Wilmington organizations, while also benefiting the community and supporting education - it will keep on giving."

Mr. Kirk announced in January 1991 early retirement effective July 31, 1991. Formerly president of the LaQue Center, he has served in the interim as senior technical advisor. Mr. Kirk joined Inco's Francis L. LaQue Corrosion Laboratory as an engineer in 1962. In 1967, he became supervisor of the marine corrosion research and testing section and in 1968 Manager. In 1979, he was appointed Director for the LaQue Center for Corrosion Technology, Inc. and in 1983 President. Under Kirk's direction, the Center has maintained a close association with the Marine Technology Department at Cape Fear.

Will Kirk is proud of Cape Fear's growth and served as a member of the Board of Trustees, Facility/Equipment and Long Range Planning Committees from 1984-1989. Since 1989, he has continued working with the trustees on the development of a Master Plan for the school.

The LaQue Center for Corrosion Technology, Inc., a contractual corrosion services, testing and consulting firm, provides services internationally for various engineering and scientific disciplines.

New Image, New Look To Come For SGA

BY BRENDA BURNELL
Staff Writer

The word in the Student Government Association (SGA) office is new, new projects, new goals, a "new image" and a new look for the SGA office. It was recently painted and the only picture of a Seahawk, which was painted over. So to replace the painted over mascot a 2 ft. Seahawk statue will soon call the SGA office home.

Some of the projects and goals that the SGA and its president Curtis Wilson are working on for the new school year include setting up a legal service with a consulting attorney who would advise students on legal matters and refer the student to an appropriate attorney. This consultation would be free, on a first come, first come basis. Also, Curtis Wilson is working with the Environmental Concerns Organization (ECO) to start a recycling program all over the campus. The SGA is also working on a way to reduce prices at the bookstore, and develop a big brother, big sister program for first time freshmen. Another goal of the SGA that

Curtis Wilson is working on is a "new image" for the SGA. After a poll was taken last year, and 67% of the students did not know what SGA stood for it was time for a "new image" to emerge for the SGA. They plan to do this by visiting residence halls, the cafeteria and other places on campus. Curtis Wilson was asked what he would like for the new freshmen and transfer students to know about him and the SGA and he said "come by and talk too him if you have a problem or want to get involved with the SGA."

FALL ELECTIONS.....

This fall, we have several student government positions open, all of which are open to freshmen. The positions of Freshman Class President, Freshmen Vice President, and 2 Freshmen Senators are open. Along with these positions are 7 Fall Representatives - At - Large openings that all students are eligible. Registration is August 22 - September 3 in the SGA office. Description of responsibility can be acquired there, but most of you have already been sent information. There is a mandatory candidate meeting on September 5 in Room 100B from 6:00 - 7:00, and the campaign will commence on September 6 and continue through September 17. The big day, Election day, will be September 18.

So if you are interested in voicing an opinion that concerns the general population of the University, seeing how a quarter of a million dollars of funds is distributed, and meeting new students and staff, get involved with SGA.

"Remember, college is what you make of it. Start now and get the most out of your college years."

Take A Faculty/Staff to Lunch

This year SGA will be implementing a new program titled "Take a Faculty/Staff to Lunch." The program, which began August 22, originated out of an attempt to promote communication and awareness between the students and the faculty/staff.

Each week the Housing and Food Services will donate 10 meals to be used at any on-campus dining facility; the cafeteria, Hawk's nest or Center Stage Cafe.

In order to treat a faculty/staff member, students must sign up in the SGA office a week prior to the luncheon engagement. All Students are eligible to participate but are responsible for the cost of their own meal.

Free Money $$$

You could receive $25 from the SGA and the Postal Services just for checking your mail. Periodically throughout the year the SGA will randomly distribute certificates worth $25 and $5 of free fax service redeemable in the SGA office (room 200 in the University Union) on or before the specified date. Remember to check your campus mail box regularly so you don't miss out on Free Money $$$!

CONTEST!!!!!!

Are you interested in advertising and design? Are you creative?

If yes, we need your services. The SGA is in need of a new logo. The Logo needs to incorporate the motto: "Students serving Students" The logo embodies student government, and thus your perception of SGA should be used. The winner will be chosen by the Senate. You must submit your design by Monday, the 16th by 12:00 noon. If your design is selected you will be awarded a gift certificate of $50.00 for the bookstore.

Coup shocks Russians

BY KAREN NEUSTADT
Colgate Press Service

then. They wouldn't tell me very much. I guess they didn't want me to get nervous."

On a hot, mid-August morning, a friend of Lena Mikhailova hand-delivered a bagful of letters from friends and family in Moscow. While she delightedly opened her mail, he regaled her with stories of the new, open lifestyle in the Soviet Union. One week later, the Colgate University senior sat numbly in front of a television set watching in disbelief as tanks rolled through Russian city streets. "It was so shocking," she said. "He said life there was so interesting, so active. We just didn't expect this to happen." The feelings Mikhailova expressed were familiar to many other Soviet students on American campuses. First, the shocking news of Mikhail Gorbachev's ouster, then collapse of the coup in a matter of days, followed by swift political changes produced an emotional roller-coaster ride for students and exchange program officials. "The coup will have a huge impact on the Soviet economy, it will affect all the world in one way or another," said Andrei Rukavishnikov, a Soviet student at Hope College. Mikhailova, who lives with Americans, Joe and Gean Thuneur, two former Colgate professors, said she was fortunate to have their support during a time of great uncertainty. "I don't know what would have happened, living in a dorm by myself. These are my adopted parents right now." The soft-spoken student admits her first reaction to the news of Gorbachev's ouster was panic. "Actually, I wanted to go home. I didn't have the money for the air ticket." It took me two hours to get through to my parents by phone. My father said he didn't want me to come back right

Although the failure of the nearly three-day coup eased immediate concerns, Mikhailova, who is majoring in geology, said she still feared the loss of lives. "All of this could lead to tragic, unpredictable circumstances. I'm trying, however, not to exaggerate things," Mikhailova, who originally came to the Hamilton, N.Y., university last year on an exchange program, convinced Colgate administrators that she needed to stay a second year to improve her English. When reports of the coup began to surface,

It was a time of high anxiety for Oleg Polakov, another Soviet student at Hope College she and school officials at Colgate expressed concern over whether two Soviet exchange students expected at the university this fall would be able to travel to the U.S. as planned. At Hope College, Tom Renner, the public relations director, complained that he has acquired a "cauliflower ear" having to respond to telephone inquiries about the 19 Soviet students who recently arrived there for their first year in the United States.

"We are viewing this situation with a lot of uncertainty. Of course there is concern for their families, and their future, now and in the distant future."

"Coup leaders will try to make people quarrel among each other. The KGB, in spite of this collapse, still possesses a lot of power," he said.

It was a time of high anxiety for Oleg Polakov, another Soviet student at Hope College. Polakov, an articulate computer student from Leningrad, also learned of the troubles in his homeland by television.

"You can imagine my feelings when I heard Gorbachev was overthrown," said Polakov, who had difficulty reaching his parents by telephone. "I really thought there would be more violence, but today... there is no need to feel the same way. I am much more cheered up." Polakov said he admired the way Boris Yeltsin conducted himself during the coup. "He will be even more popular (now). He was the only leader who was persistent in his desire to continue opposing the coup. He made a lot of efforts to fight it."

He attended Leningrad University before deciding to pursue a degree in economics in the United States. He was eating breakfast when his wife alerted him of the news bulletin. Polakov says he had ambivalent feelings: shock mixed with "I knew it."

"I was not really surprised," says Polakov. "I knew the situation was very tense and could lead to a civil war very easily. I just could not believe the Communist Party would let the democratic movement take over. I don't think there is a threat of another coup. I hope that Gorbachev will be more quick with his economic reforms. I feel he was in-between the democratic and conservative movements."

Health And Wellness Is Moving

BY BETH CAPPS

Staff Writer

The Health and Wellness Center is about to move. The center will move into the old cafeteria located across the parking lot between the University Center and the University Union. The move begins this fall and is expected to be completed by the end of October.

Kathleen Jewel, M.D., and director of the Health and Wellness Center, is excited about the move.

"It's the light at the end of the tunnel," she exclaimed. "It's a newer building with double space and a resource room that will have slides and articles for the students to look at."

The center, which will also house the Student Development Center and the Liwvel Program, plans to operate on the same hours, 8:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m. Monday - Friday. Treatment will be provided for many medical problems, including injuries, sexually transmitted diseases, upper respiratory infections, and gynecological examinations. Students who are taking six or more hours a semester are entitled to the health care services while those taking less than six hours are expected to pay. All students will have to pay for allergy injection, pap smears, and contraceptive exams regardless of how many hours are being taken.

Intramurals Gets Major Face Lift

BY PATRICK FOWLER
Sports Editor

"Everything we do in this office is for the students of UNCW. It is their money that pays for this office and its programs," Elaine Penn, the new director of recreation and intramurals said.

"Fitness isn't a trend anymore, it is something people can attain and improve on their whole life."

Miss Penn is no stranger to physical fitness having assisted head volleyball coach, Kathy McDaniel, for five years. Penn's appointment to the directorship is the second part of a four-step approach the athletic department has taken to improve its efficiency levels and image.

The first stage began last year when a committee was formed to hear students' grievances about the recreational services provided by the university. The committee, combined with the University of North Carolina at Wilmington Chancellor James Leutze's new policies led to Penn's appointment to the recreation and intramural position.

The post of intramural director was formerly held by women's golf coach, Lea Dudley. Dudley still handles the intramural flag football program but is now free to concentrate more on teaching her classes and coaching.

"Lea was just overworked last year," Penn said. "She also had to handle the whole intramural load by herself. This program will have a secretary who will take incoming calls and answer questions."

"It will also have a student worker. Also, I will personally be here to supervise all recreation events until they are over."

Penn emphasizes that the new recreation program is substantially different from the original one.

"This office is more than team sports," Penn said. "We are offering aerobics with both high and low impact workout sessions, aquacise, and an anaerobic workout in the pool. Hopefully next semester we'll be able to map out a personal individual exercise program for students.

All our instructors will be screened before being offered the job. They also must be certified in both CPR and aerobics. Of course, we will still offer intramural sports in flag football, outdoor and indoor soccer, indoor basketball, softball, ping pong and a new sport, tennis," she said.

Further changes in the recreation services include using students in professor Larry Honeycutt's officiating class as referees for the extracurricular contests. The students must call the games as part of their grade, for the course.

"We train all our referees before they are placed out on the court," Penn said. "We also are going to allow the managers of the individual intramural teams to evaluate our official performance."

The third stage in the new athletic recreation approach calls for a committee to hear grievances and offer suggestions for improving the recreation program. The new service group, Teaching Others To Appreciate Lifelong Recreation or Total-Rec Team, is composed of both students and recreation personnel.

"This committee will allow at (the recreation office) to evaluate and improve ourselves throughout the year. It is here where students can bring their grievances first-hand and know that their problems are being given the utmost importance."

The final step in the new efficiency approach is the action taken, based on students' complaints and suggestions, to improve and upgrade the intramural program to meet their needs.

The department of recreation and intramurals begins its fall campaign by offering both aerobics and flag football.

Seahawks Set For Showdown

BY PATRICK FOWLER
Sports Editor

R-E-S-P-E-C-T.

That is precisely what the University of North Carolina at Wilmington women's volleyball is looking for this weekend in a three-team round robin tournament in Hanover Hall.

The Seahawks will play three other North Carolina system schools: UNC-Asheville, UNC-Charlotte, and UNC-Chapel Hill in the two day event.

The Tarheels are making their first ever appearance on the Seahawks' home court, a fact that head coach Kathy McDaniel has reminded her team of more than once.

In previous seasons teams like Chapel Hill, Duke, and NC State would refuse to play here, so we had to travel up I-40. In the last couple of seasons, however, we have showed that we can play at their level and intensity.

In fact, last year we defeated State and Clemson in the off-season and took a game from William and Mary. The Tribe has beaten Duke, Carolina, and State more than once. The teams are suddenly taking us a lot more seriously than before.

The Lady Seahawks, like their soccer counterpart, were hit hard by graduation. UNCW lost four players, all which were starters, including second team All-CAA Hannah Hilton and UNCW top server Heather Kimble.

However the Seahawks also picked up four top-ranked recruits: Leslie Noukelak, Rebecca Simmonds, Debbie Tavdus, and Josie Youngblood.

"We have a lot of youth, but it's good youth," McDaniel said. "Our depth this season is the best we've ever had and it will help us have a good season."

Youngblood was one of the most sought after recruits during the spring and early summer months. The talented 5'11 freshman was approached by both volleyball and basketball coaches.

Youngblood led her West Henderson High School team to the State 3A volleyball championship as a junior and was named the Lady Falcons' Player-of-the-Year in both sports.

"Josie will be factor for us this season," McDaniel said. "She has a good chance to break into the starting line-up, but it's going to take her a while to adjust to college game."

UNCW, in addition to shifting in new faces in the line-up, will place familiar ones in new roles. Senior Leslie Knauss and junior Jennifer Jamieson will fill the shoes left by Helton and Kimble. Jamieson will play the right power outside hitter spot while Knauss, who is coming off an ankle injury, will anchor the left outside post side.

McDaniel has also decided to go with one setter this season, Sheldon Plotovich.

"I feel with the talent we have this year I can afford to stay with one setter," McDaniel said. "The girls can also get used to one setting speed."

Before with Julie (Shouse) and Sheldon splitting the setting duties, their hitters had to adjust their jumps dramatically because Julie sets the ball quicker and lower than Sheldon.

Shouse is now teaming with Parks and newcomer Simmonds to anchor the defense with solid digs from the back row. However, the main gun for the Seahawk will be third leading shot blocker in the country, Kim Cavanaugh.

Cavanaugh played her first season for UNCW after transferring from Onondaga Community College. The 6'0 senior middle hitter shattered the single season records in total blocks (230) and block game average (2.03).

"Blocking just comes naturally to me," Cavanaugh said. "However, I feel I have improved from last season because I don't follow the ball solely. I watch the setter and the hitter closely so I can be in the right place to make the block."

The Seahawks have set a goal of 20 wins or more for this season. UNCW starts that quest Friday against UNC-Charlotte.

Seahawk Booters Seek Scorers

BY PATRICK FOWLER
Sports Editor

A real team effort is how head soccer coach Jackie Blackmore described the offensive potential of the University of North Carolina at Wilmington Seahawks. The Seahawks lost five players to graduation or NCAA eligibility from last year, most notably key starters Chris George, Dean Marnell, and John Pinter.

George, the fifth leading scorer in UNCW history, wrapped up a four-year Seahawk career with 27 goals and 12 assists. The Bethesda, Maryland striker led the Seahawks in scoring with seven goals, and two assists last season in addition to being named to second team All-CAA team. The former Seahawk also captured first CAA and rookie team honors during his four-year career.

"You can't replace a player like Chris George," Blackmore said. "He was an explosive player with a powerful foot. He was a threat to score everytime he touched the ball. That type of athlete is what coaches fight to have on their squad. What we will look for from our guys this season is a more balanced attack."

That offensive punch, according to Blackmore, will hinder around five in six players. Seniors Peter Clay, Greg Diamond, junior Scott Leferis, and sophomores Miguel Bordo and Paul Cairney are expected to play major roles in the Seahawks' scoring successes.

Clay, who posted three goals and two assists in 1990, was the third leading scorer at UNCW last season behind George and Marnell. The Arlington, Va. midfielder started thirteen games for the Seahawks, doubling his minutes on the field. Blackmore however, is impressed more with the way his senior uses his head.

"Pete isn't an explosive player like Chris (George)," Blackmore said. "Pete gets the job done on the field by using his head in two ways. He knows how to find the open man on the field and he heads the soccer ball better than anyone in the league. Pete grinds things out and simply gets the job done."

Cairney is another player Blackmore has his eye on to be a catalyst for the youthful Seahawks. The Clydebank, Scotland native, played only nine games last season after coming off a major knee surgery suffered his freshman year. This season, the sophomore will likely make a transition from the sweeper sweeper position to center forward.

"Paul is now fully recovered from his injury. He is the type of player I can place anywhere on the field and he will perform well. He will score some goals this season. I'll stake my reputation on it."

Defensively, the Seahawks will sorely miss veteran goalkeeper John Pinter. Pinter started all 15 games for the Seahawks last season stopping 86 shots for a 1.50 goal scored on average per game. He was also named to the first team All-CAA squad. Pinter's heir apparent is senior Tom Redmond. Redmond played in two contests last season in relief of Pinter.

"You really can replace a player like Pinter either," Blackmore said. He played some incredible games for us last season. There were times when he made some saves that I didn't think could be made."

"However, saying that, I have the utmost confidence in Tom in our goal this season. In my eyes Tom and John were always at our near the same level last year. Those two players really pushed one another in practice. The competition was beneficial to both players' performances."

VC Search Continues

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

No replacement has been found to fill the vacant position of Vice Chancellor for University Advancement. The reason is a search for the best person in a competitive market.

Mark Lanier, special assistant to the chancellor, said the search has been extensive. The search committee recommended four candidates to fill the position and two of them accepted appointments at larger universities. "The committee did a good job of identifying what other institutions want. This shows that the committee is looking for the very best. We are confident we can find that person."

The job responsibilities, as stated on an advertisement for the position, include the development of a comprehensive advancement program, the management and direction of its success, supervision of a staff of public relations professionals, fundraising and relations with corporations and foundations. "Raising funds is the primary purpose. Public institutions are not as experienced as private ones, who survive off funds raised from alumni, gifts, and endowments. Within the past 20 years, public universities have come on stronger in this area," Lanier said.

Lanier said the candidate needed fundraising experience with educational foundations, education-related or other non-profit organizations.

As well, the candidate needs to possess communication and personal skills, excellent organizational skills and initiative. "That is very important to the chancellor, a pro-active stance."

For now, no other committee has been formed for further search, but the chancellor has been identifying candidates to be narrowed down for interviews with faculty, students, trustees and others. "Often, the best candidate is found without a search in progress. Often, it is true the best is not looking for the job," Lanier said.

"We're not trading water. Filling the vacancy is an ongoing action. It is being filled on an interim basis but expect good news," Lanier added. The vacancy could be filled sooner, Lanier said. "If we were willing to be satisfied with less than the best, it would be easier. The field is competitive and there are offers out there that are too good to refuse."

University Advancement is responsible for fundraising and public relations. The previous purpose for the department used to be development, with an emphasis on fundraising. Through advancement-publicity and fundraising-the visibility is improved. This helps in obtaining gifts and enhancing the value of a degree from that institution. "A degree from UNCW is worth more to the student if advancement is a success."

Students also benefit from gifts through scholarships and endowments. Funds are also raised to attract and keep a faculty of good quality. Faculty development is also encouraged. Buildings and facilities are made possible by gifts and other programs are made possible by gifts such as land.

Tyrone Rowell is presently serving as the interim replacement in the vacant position. Rowell's normal job is associate vice chancellor of University Advancement. His regular duties are to supervise alumni affairs, parent publications and the University Relations division of Advancement. Rowell is also secretary to the Foundation of UNCW.

The vice chancellor's job includes for Rowell to head the budgets for the office, plan the advancement campaign and work with trustees and the chancellor's cabinet. The vice chancellor is also given a block of the chancellor's time to manage by helping him get to know people in the community. "The job is very external and highly visible," Rowell said. For now, Rowell is doing both his job and that of the vice chancellor.

Rowell is interim vice chancellor because he chose not to become a candidate. "Chancellor Leutze wants a new image, a new look for the university."

Rowell said the biggest change involving his job has been a change in scope. He is working with other senior officers at a level higher he has not worked at before. His work is more direct with the chancellor, the cabinet, and the trustee committee on University Advancement. "I have to be careful the decision I make is right. The vice chancellor might say something about a flaw. I've never been held accountable for these decisions before."

Rowell feels the services provided "entice the entire community." He is proud of endowments and scholarships and the university's publications like catalogs for admissions, parents and alumni publications. Rowell is also proud of other services provided for the 15,000 member alumni association, the parents and the faculty by producing magazines geared toward the alumni and their activities, the university and the faculty's research.

"The only way to know what's going on is to be part of the total campus and that is important," Rowell said. He stressed that Advancement's work touches the whole campus.

Rowell assumed his present position from Jane Patterson, who was appointed when he was activated for duty in Operation Desert Storm in January. Originally, the plan was for Rowell to immediately assume the position as soon as it was vacated in late February.

Rowell said that his staff are "extraordinarily talented and creative beyond productivity. The university has a bargain in the Advancement Office. They are a great return for the buck. The people are a whole fit; they work as a team." Lanier said "Ty Rowell's service has been and continues to be outstanding."

Rowell is anxious to get a new vice chancellor for University Advancement. "I'm looking forward to working with him."

Improvements Begin

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

Housing and Food Services began their five-year-long Capital Improvements program over the summer. Some of their projects include renovation of residence halls, institution of new meal plans and installation of a convenience store on campus.

"There is a strong commitment to look at the residence halls, to make them more comfortable and pleasing," said Charles Maimone, Director of Housing and Food Services. This improvement came about by attending meetings of hall government, Residence Hall Association and Student Government Association.

Belk, Graham, Galloway, and Hewlett Halls have renovated lobbies; Hewlett, Graham, and Belk have new bathroom shelving. There has also been furniture replacement in these dorms.

Some of the repairs in the halls are not apparent. Roof repairs, shutter replacement and aluminum siding have been done in the apartments. As well as these repairs, new carpet was put in 40 apartments and living room fixtures were replaced.

The apartments area is home to more than its residents; it houses the campus convenience store. The store offers items of convenience and necessity. Although located in Apartment M, it is for all students. Students are encouraged to check out the new facility by Maimone.

Another renovation on campus does not involve the buildings but the meal plans. Students now must choose a 9 meals-a-week plan to eat at Wagoner Hall or weekday lunch at the Hawk's Nest or Center Stage Cafe. "These plans are to provide flexibility for the students," said Maimone.

Declining balance, a new program this year, was established to give students the convenience of cash on account without having to carry it. Students possessing either meal plan must keep a minimum of $25 on their meal card. Money is put into a student's account in the Housing office at the rear of Wagoner Hall. Students can charge items at the Hawk's Nest, Center Stage Cafe, Iltza Pizza and the convenience store.

Two renovations in progress under the students' eyes are the Hawk's Nest and the installation of a volleyball pit, picnic tables and a grill to replace the tennis court behind Galloway Hall. The Hawk's Nest was readied for renovation over summer and the renovations will be completed over Fall Break. Maimone pointed out the new ceiling and the fact that traffic flow better in the Hawk's Nest.

Maimone said the students are responding well to the 9 meals and declining balance plan but "We will continue to offer a full plan. We are committed to offering high quality dining and we are working toward that."

Letter From SGA President Curtis Says "Get Involved!"

BY CURTIS WILSON
Student Body President

Greetings to all. I would like to welcome you to your 91-92 school year at UNCW. I am Curtis Wilson, your current Student Body President.

As I began my 4th year at UNCW strong feelings of deja vu came over me. It seems like just yesterday it was my freshman year and I was running around trying to find my classes, waiting in line to buy books, and searching for familiar faces. After three years I am still doing the same things and it feels great. Coming to UNCW is one choice which I will never regret.

UNCW has given me a lot and still has a lot more to offer me. Some of these opportunities just fell into my lap, others took a little work to uncover. The one piece of advice I offer to enrich your 4, 5, or 6 college years is to get involved.

Extracurricular and social activities have been a major part in my UNCW career. My recipe for a fantastic college career is a special blend of the academic, extracurricular, and social opportunities. As with good food, to much of one ingredient will spoil the mix, so it is important that you discover what blend of opportunities is right for you. Use these chances or they will disappear and life might not be what it could have been!

Now for a word about SGA. We have been busy cooking up new and exciting things for the students. Take a Faculty/Staff to Lunch, Meet Your Senator Nite at Center Stage Cafe, and P.O. Box Surprise are just a couple services we've concocted. Some other things we're working on are Legal Services, Little Seahawk program, and some type of solution to bookstore prices.

Look for more information on these topics in our weekly page in the Seahawk, the SGA Update. These are just the things we have come up with; we are always looking for suggestions from you. You pay a SGA fee each semester you attend UNCW. What do you want your money to do for you?

Stop by the office or the Senate meetings to tell us what we're doing right or what we should be doing. We hold weekly Senate meetings each Monday night at 6:00 in Room 100 of the University Union. The SGA office is located in Room 200 of the University Union. It is open 8 to 5 each weekday and there is always someone there waiting for a question.

For a special treat you will be able to see the two-foot statue of the Seahawk we ordered. It will be arriving in the near future, so plan your trip now.

In closing I want to urge you to make the best out of your years here by creating your special blend. If I can be of any help please don't hesitate to call or stop by the SGA office. My office hours are MWF 9-11 and TWR 4-5.

Area Aquarium A Possibility

BY HOLLY PRICE
Contributing Writer

UNCW has received a $35,000 grant from the A.J. Fletcher Foundation of Raleigh to study the feasibility of locating a "world-class" aquarium in Wilmington. UNCW Chancellor James Leutze announced Monday that the university had received the grant, which will pay for the study by Joseph Wetzel Associates, Inc., an aquarium design firm.

If the report by the firm indicates building the aquarium, funding is secured, and the facility is built, UNCW's Biology students will be able to use the facilities for research.

Leutze said at a meeting with the aquarium interest committee that he wants the university to take an active role in the development of aquarium programs. "UNCW, because of its location, its existing marine science programs and its faculty expertise, is ideally suited to lead the state's marine research programs," he said.

Guiding the study will be Jane Patterson, of UNCW, Dr. Jim Lanier from the N.C. Aquarium in Fort Fisher, Dr. James Merritt from UNCW's Center for Marine Science Research (CMSR), and Joe Augustine from the Wilmington Chamber of Commerce.

The committee will look into aspects including the economic feasibility of the project, sites, educational programs, and the amount of money that will be brought in due to the tourism, Patterson said.

"From experience, aquaria I have been involved with in the past, bring in a great deal of revenue to the area that houses them," said Joe Wetzel, whose group is involved in the study.

Wetzel cited an aquarium he worked on in Corpus Christi, Texas. The city invested $10 million in the aquarium, but got back $3.5 million in sales tax and a 33% increase in hotel and motel revenue in the first year the aquarium was open.

The question has been raised as to what will become of the three other aquaria located in North Carolina. They are located at Fort Fisher, Roanoke Island, and Pine Knoll Shores.

"As of right now we don't know whether we will stay where we are or be combined with the new aquarium if it is built," said Andy Wood from the N.C. Aquarium in Fort Fisher.

One major difference between the proposed aquarium and the existing N.C. state aquaria is that the new facility will feature marine life from all over the world as opposed to the local habitation exhibited at the N.C. Aquaria.

Several sites are being looked into for the aquarium. "It isn't absolutely necessary to build it on water," said Patterson, but most aquaria are built near water for aesthetic reasons.

Patterson said that the committee will consider parking, highway access, and land area when deciding on a location for the facility.

A decision will be made in January of 1992 on whether the plan is feasible.

UNCW Students Participate In Dolphin Watch

BY DENISE SUTTON
Staff Writer

Eleven years ago, Guy Stefanski may have been sitting in Bryan Auditorium frantically scribbling notes while trying to catch the professor's next sentence. However, last Saturday afternoon, Guy was the person behind the podium, organizing notes and maps, preparing to meet with a diverse group of volunteers. Stefanski, a 1980 UNCW graduate, is the founder of Cetacean Awareness Programs, a volunteer organization interested in the protection and preservation of marine mammals and their environment. The volunteers were meeting to discuss the research they gathered earlier that morning.

With a degree in environmental studies and a concentration in marine science, Stefanski began his career as an environmental consultant. Not completely satisfied with the 9 to 5 routine, he created Cetacean Awareness Programs (CAP) in 1987. "I always had the creation in mind," he said. "I've always been fascinated with dolphins and whales and the word extinction always scared me."

Out of CAP, Stefanski and his wife, Debbie, organized Day of the Dolphin, a research and education project that was an attempt to learn more about the biology, population density, and movements of bottlenose dolphins along the North Carolina coast.

After attending a brief orientation, volunteers monitored dolphin activity at one-mile intervals along the beaches from New River Inlet to Corolla Inlet.

Sightings this summer, all within the same study area, included: 178 dolphin sightings on May 4, 177 sightings June 22 and on July 27

Volunteers observed and counted pods of dolphins that passed by Wrightsville Beach.

There were 36 dolphins sighted. The most recent Day of the Dolphin project was last Saturday. Despite the rainy weather Saturday, volunteers were at their stations prepared to monitor dolphin activity.

Audrey Moore and Gwen Skinner, both of Raleigh, were stationed at Johnny Mercer's Pier in Wrightsville Beach. They sat in beach chairs, with towels draped over their heads and binoculars in hand, anxious to spot a pod of dolphins.

Moore, who works for an electronics manufacturing company in Raleigh, has a passion for dolphins. She described her connection with mammals as, "a form of peace you can't find anywhere else."

"It's a spiritual healing, a connection," said Moore. Saturday was her fourth dolphin watch.

First time volunteer, Francie Knight, a marine biology student at UNCW, learned about Day of the Dolphin from the flyers posted around campus. Stationed at the Blockade Runner on Wrightsville Beach, Knight was busy observing a pod of dolphins she had just sighted.

Stationed with Knight was Hope Sutton and her daughter, Lindsey. "I want them here for a long time," said Sutton, while she kept an eye on the pod of dolphins she and Knight had just spotted. "If I can help out by being here in the rain I'll do it," she said. Saturday was Sutton and Lindsey's second dolphin watch.

During the four hour watch volunteers filled out sighting record forms that described dolphin behavior, group characteristics, and physical conditions. From these data sheets, Stefanski produces a summary report which he sends to several environmental organizations and universities. Stefanski works closely with

Dennis Kelly, director of the Coastal Dolphin Survey Project at Orange Coast College, La Jolla, CA. "Dennis gives me advice; he encouraged me to start the Day of the Dolphin project," said Stefanski. "It's a big challenge but lots of fun."

Stefanski was equally enthusiastic about his experience at UNCW. "UNCW was the best place for me, no doubt about it." Guy added that he was considering moving back to the Wilmington area to pursue his graduate degree at UNCW.

The next Day of the Dolphin research project is scheduled for late September. Anyone interested in volunteering can call Stefanski at (919) 469-8780 or write to: Cetacean Awareness Programs, 221 Clancy Circle, Cary, NC 27511.

12 reasons why you'll love Macintosh

1. It's easy to use.

Bring home an Apple® Macintosh® computer today, and use it to complete assignments by tonight—even if you've never used a computer before.

2. You don't have to speak computerese.

Instead of cryptic MS-DOS commands such as COPY, C:\WORDPROC\DRIFT.DOC > A:\WORK, Macintosh uses familiar words such as Copy and Print, and pictures such as file folders for saving your documents and a trash can for files you want to throw away.

3. You don't have to be a computer science major to set one up.

Just plug everything together, flip the "on" switch, and you're ready to roll.

4. It's a breeze to copy information and paste it into another document.

To copy the chart simply use the mouse to choose the Copy command.

To place the chart in another document just choose the Paste command.

To place the chart in another document just choose the Paste command.

5. All Macintosh programs work in the same way.

Learn to use one Macintosh program, and you've learned the basics of using them all. For example, the commands you use, such as Open, Close, Copy, Paste, Save, Cut, Print, and Undo, are found in the same place—every time.

6. It can grow with you.

This week you're majoring in philosophy, next week it's nuclear physics. After all, no one knows exactly what the future will bring. That's why millions of students have found that investing in a Macintosh is a smart move. Because Macintosh can immediately help you do whatever you do—better. And if, come tomorrow, you find that you want to do something different, no problem. It's easy to upgrade your Macintosh to help you rise to the challenge.

7. It's great for college and beyond.

Doing your work faster, better, and more creatively is also a plus in the working world—and that's precisely why Macintosh computers are used in 74 percent of Fortune 1000 companies.*

8. It's got connections.

To connect a printer, a modem, an external hard disk, or just about any other peripheral to a Macintosh, simply plug it in. That's all there is to it.

9. It lets you work with others.

Every Macintosh is equipped with an Apple SuperDrive™, a unique floppy disk drive that can use not only Macintosh disks, but also MS-DOS and OS/2 disks created on IBM and IBM-compatible computers. With SoftPC from Insignia Solutions, you can even run MS-DOS applications on your Macintosh.

10. It's so easy to network.

Just connect the LocalTalk™ cable from one Macintosh to another Macintosh. It takes just a few minutes, and you don't have to buy any additional hardware or software.

11. You can connect to your school's mainframe or minicomputer.

With Macintosh, you can send in assignments, gain access to software you need for a class, and receive lecture notes, class schedules, class information—right from your own room.

12. It's more affordable than ever.

Macintosh prices have never been lower—especially with the student pricing available from your authorized Apple campus reseller. You may even qualify for financing, which makes Macintosh even more affordable.

These reasons all add up to the power of Macintosh. The power to be your best.

Myrick Enters Senate Race

If you like Jesse Helms, you're going to love Sue Myrick. Charlotte Mayor Myrick threw her hat into the 1991 senate race Tuesday. She is the fourth Republican to enter. If she receives the nomination, she will run against Democrat Terry Sanford.

Myrick is a conservative in the Helmsian sense of the word.

In guest columns she has written for the Charlotte Observer, the Charlotte daily newspaper, Myrick has presented ideas about pornography, freedom of religion, and drug use which go beyond threatening the right of privacy and personal freedom.

Myrick has consistently encouraged the teaching of Christian doctrine in the public schools (not Christian values, but Christianity itself). She attempted to thwart assertions of separation of church and state by saying, "Freedom of religion does not mean freedom from religion."

Maybe she should say "Freedom of religion does not mean freedom from my religion."

If that isn't what it means, what does it mean?

Apparently freedom from search and seizure without probable cause doesn't rank high on her priority list either.

Myrick proposed a plan in another Observer column which would require everyone in Charlotte to get a drug test. Then, only those with clean tests would be hired for any job in Charlotte.

It gets better. Those who test positive would have their names published in the newspapers, exposing them to public shame.

Or was it the names of the non-Christians she was going to have published in the paper? Oh, well...

She never got those programs started in Charlotte, but who knows? Maybe she and Jesse could make a few waves in Washington. Even if the Helms-Myrick team failed to make the programs law, they would succeed in embarrassing the citizens of North Carolina in front of the entire nation, as Helms has done so many times before.

Hours In Trask Should Be Extended

Every year the students at UNCW pay four separate fees to various facets of the athletic department. One of those facets involves the cost of keeping Trask and the facilities inside open to the students.

Yet, Trask is locked up on Sunday — the day which, for many students, offers the most time for activities outside of academia.

Trask offers courts for basketball and racketball. It offers Nautilus equipment for weight lifting. It offers a swimming pool. And it offers an air-conditioned place to walk or run.

And the students pay for all of those things.

The powers which decide the open hours in Trask should take a look at opening the building on Sunday. The students would undoubtedly put it to good use.

Tourism Is A Mixed Blessing At Best

BY PHILLIP LOUGHLIN
Contributing Writer

Tourism has flooded our highways with drunks and jerks (and drunken jerks).

Some of you may already be acquainted with my friend. We usually assault the topics of the day, politics, society, etc. In our conversations—discussions which often end up in this column.

Well, we were spouting off our opinions yesterday about various things. I brought up the attempted coup in the Soviet Union. He said it was a ruse, designed to garner financial aid from the international community. I thought it was the real thing, and that its failure was a death blow to the old "Red Menace". From that point, we moved on to debate the L'il Rascals sexual abuse case in Edenton. I called it a "what hurt. My friend just said, "What if..."

Just then, a car with New York tags blew by us, heading north. I mumbled something about good bye and good riddance... another tourist gone. That comment inspired the following harangue from my friend.

"I drove down to the beach today. I pulled into the circle at Johnny Mercer's pier and parked right beside the boardwalk. I got out and walked on a long lonely stretch of beach, never once having to alter my course to avoid beach blankets, prone figures, squalling children, and coolers full of beer."

"To be quite honest, there were a few people scattered around. Mine was not the only car in the lot. But the thing was, there was no crowd. Everybody had elbow room. I enjoyed the beach for probably the first time since early May. The tourists are finally gone."

At the risk of offending a large fraction of the local populace, I too, was glad to see the tourists go. I realize that they pour millions of dollars into the local economy every season. I understand completely that without tourism, a huge number of local businesses would go under, taking jobs and revenues with them. I work in a convenience store that would probably never exist without the tourist trade. I just want my beach back. My friend's attitude was more militant.

"What has tourism done?" he railed. "Tourism paved Myrtle Beach. Wrightsville is pretty much all asphalt now, as is most of the once rural area surrounding it. Wilmington has certainly prospered too. A simple glance at the number of strip malls or a whiff of the air at rush hour are sufficient evidence of the boom status Wilmington has achieved through tourism."

"Tourism has flooded our highways with drunks and jerks (and drunken jerks). It has packed our beaches with people who lack the intelligence to realize that the ocean is more than just a big swimming pool (Witness the idiots body surfing in the storm swell of Hurricane Bob, and those on the Outer Banks who wanted to stay and see the effects of a hurricane first hand)—people who seem to believe the beaches are big sandy trash cans. It has brought people into the businesses and private lives of the locals who think that we must bow and lick their boots because they are spending their dollars in northeast of September blew in they packed their bags and headed for home. These were people who respected the ocean and the folks who lived on it."

"Then, around the turn of the century, some genius of a city forefather decided that Wrightsville should become the 'Atlantic City of the South'. That was, excuse this lapse of originality, the beginning of the end."

"Most tourists still come here for the same reasons," I tried to squeeze in.

"Again I met ready agreement. 'Yeah, they do. Look out on Banks Channel during the season. You can hardly see the water for the boats and jet skis. You can't launch at the public landing without someone trying to cut you off at the ramp. Even when you get to the ramp, some dummy in a thirty-footer will come roaring along oblivious to our hometown."

"I do want to clear something up before I get much farther. When I mention tourists, I am not just talking about Northerners. Some of the worst kind of tourists come from the South, including North Carolina. I also gladly admit that some locals can be just as bad as tourists, but that is another issue altogether."

I tried to cut in. "All tourists aren't that bad."

"No, you're right," he said. I gaped at his ready agreement. "People used to come here to enjoy the rural seaside life. They came to swim and fish, or maybe to do a little boating. When the tie no wake signs, and his wake bill of you just boat up into the back of your truck. These tourists have no respect for the law, for other people, or for the environment they pretend to care so much about."

"They get out in the ocean, as big as the ocean is, and crowd around one damned spot. You can't troll around there because some observant skipper will cut neatly across your lines, nicely stripping a hundred yards of monofilament off your reel before you can cut it off."

"Fishing off the beach is out because of the tightly packed flailing bodies out there and the continuous slick of tanning butter they leave floating on the tide."

"But it's not just the beach they come for. They crowd the roads in town too, heading for these stupid little malls and shopping centers. The more they shop, the more we build. Every decent patch of woods in town has been sliced up, subdivided for a strip mall or a new road. Sure, it means somebody's making money, but look at what we're losing. On top of all this, the tourists whine about there being nothing to do in this town!"

"What it really boils down to is that there are too many of them. It's a self-destructive thing that I can't wait to see come to fruition. Tourists flooded Florida until it got too crowded. Then they moved north. Next to overflow was Myrtle Beach. Now Wilmington is beginning to sag under the influx of more and more tourists. I live for the day when the tourists say, 'Honey, Wilmington was too crowded. Let's go somewhere else this year.'"

I wonder though, if that might not be a bitterly mixed blessing.

Learn A Bookstore Lesson Or Two

BY PHIL SMITH
Contributing Writer

My four books cost slightly less than a semester's tuition (and a small yacht).

This is my second year here at UNCW and, unlike many of my friends, I'm proud to say that I did indeed complete the brutal, often unsurpassable requirements necessary to be among the race of Earth-beings commonly called sophomores. Now that I am a sophomore, and therefore know everything there is to know about college, I planned early on to go to the bookstore ahead of time, so as to avoid the rush and get the best selection of overpriced used books as opposed to greatly overpriced new books. But since I am a sophomore, and rarely use anything I know about college, I waited until Friday afternoon to go to the campus bookstore.

Rule #1 in Phil's Unabridged Student Status (Hereafter referred to as PUSS): Do Not Wait Until Friday Afternoon To Go To The Campus Bookstore!!!

I parked in the nearest available spot. (You know, down at the cafeteria.) I had to walk the ten miles up to the bookstore because, as always, the Seahawk Shuttle was loaded to full capacity.

When I arrived I found a small

(two miles, tops) line extending outward from the bookstore around to the "bookstore workers only" parking lot. Actually I stopped just short of the bookstore manager's '92 Lamborghini. That kinda makes me go "hmmmm?"

Well, I finally made it through the line to the "check approval" table. Yes, Virginia, they had actually hired two ladies to sit there and "approve" (a.k.a. Stamp) our checks. And just what, one may ask, does this check approval stamp say? How about "To the credit of Harlan Boyles, State Treasurer." I often wonder just who this Boyles fellow is and why all of my school payments go to his credit. Just imagine if the same thing happens at the other fifteen UNC schools! This dude must have a lot of credit. I must make a note to find out if he has a daughter.

Anyway... I finally made it inside the doorway where I was interrogated by a security guard as to my name, student I.D. number and next of kin. (The latter information was just in case I was killed in a shootout between two Criminal Justice majors fighting over the last copy of American Criminal Justice.) As I made my way into the bookstore, I found myself amongst about eight thousand other students looking for books. Actually, about half of them were undercover campus police officers just waiting to nab some hardened criminal (posing as an everyday college student), attempting to slip out the door with a few Webster's Dictionaries tucked inside his underwear. Funny thing about those campus cops; they're always around when you're stealing Webster's Dictionaries or something, but you just can't find one whenever someone is parked illegally.

Well, my trip to the campus bookstore as one professor calls it, "the Campus Bandic Shop" did prove to be profitable, for the bookstore, that is.

I figure they charge by the pound because my four books, weighing in at two tons, cost slightly less than a semester's tuition (and a small yacht). Dad said he had planned to take out another mortgage on our house anyway. Well, that was the end of my money, and this the end of my story. Until next time. Keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

Stillpoint Life's Question May Be Left Unanswered

BY BOB HAYWOOD
Campus Minister

You're living in an environment where high value is placed upon finding the "right" answers to certain questions or problems. As a matter of fact, that has been the orientation of all of our education thus far which has left us, often times, feeling uncomfortable and insecure when we can't find answers to questions we are asking.

When we internalize this attitude, we take on a kind of inner philosophical belief that our future depends on finding the right answers.

I have no quarrel with the importance of finding the answers to a certain level of problems. My concern is that we focus too much on answers. The poet, Rainer Maria Rilke, wrote in a letter of counsel to a young poet,

"Be patient toward all that is unsolved in your heart. And try to love the questions themselves. Do not seek the answers that cannot be given you because you would not be able to live them. And the point is to live everything. Live the questions now. Perhaps you will then, gradually, without noticing it, live along some distant day into the answers."

At some level, you are dealing with some very significant questions in your life. Who am I? Who do I love? What do I want to do with my life? What is the right major for me? Why is there so much pain and anguish in the world? Why do I often feel so insecure?

Questions like these are critically important but perhaps, the most important element in our life process is to become aware of and articulate the questions themselves as the issues which we are living.

The reality is that life does not yield answers to important questions according to our individual schedules. We are too impatient as we demand quick responses to deep questions. Each of you is a person who is unfolding according to your own unique internal rhythm and pace and you must learn to be more gentle with yourself. Understand that a faithful living of whatever questions are dominating your landscape will lead you slowly and surely toward insight, resolution, and decision.

I'm not encouraging passivity. Ask the questions; work on the issues; be intentional about seeking out the resources that would help you explore whatever it is that stands center stage in your questioning and searching mind. But know also that patience and openness to insights that might come from unexpected directions are essential to the process. We don't find solutions to major questions, we grow insights that turn out to be answers for us.

What are the life questions that stand center stage for you at this point in your life? Write them down; look at them; reflect on them. If you need to do anything beyond awareness, work on finding one step that you can take in dealing with the question. Let your need for an "answer" go. Live the questions!

I'm going to be hosting a monthly event called "Food for Thought" built around dinner and dialogue about some of the issues of values and meaning that are part of our life. If you might be interested in being part of such a conversation, call me, Bob Haywood at 799-3497 and leave me your name, phone number, and PO Box Number.

Just Give Me A Room With A Nice View

It might interest you to know that Aerosmith just signed a contract for $30 million. It interests me greatly. Thirty million... .Thir-ty mil-lion dollars. It's inconceivable to me that anyone could make that much in one year, let alone a lifetime.

One of my brothers, who is a professional drummer and has quite reached that thirty million dollar mark... .tee-hee) always told me to remember that that money has to be divided among countless many; band members, managers, agents, road crew, the ever-faithful I.R.S., moms, free-loading bums, divorce settlements, etc..

Okay, so, let's figure about a cool million for the hard work your agents and managers have been doing. And the road crew, well, you will worry about that when, and if, you ever decide to tour again. Most of that cost will be picked up by sponsorship anyway. And after the tax man takes a whopping 50%, you will still be left with roughly $14 million. But if you don't take at least several hundred thousand and buy "good old Mom" a house... .WITH A MAID (per explicit instructions from my mother in case any of her kids strike it rich), well, then you run the risk of an intense guilt complex that she will NEVER let you forget.

Now all you have to do is split it up between the band members. (Which I'm sure has been the reasons for many bands to split-up). That will still leave quite a substantial amount, more than I ever expect to make in my whole lifetime. (Sorry, Mom, but being a writer, I have to think realistically.)

What about mega-stars like Janet and her brother, oh, what-his-name... .Michael, who are getting $32 and $25 million respectively and have already bought their parents a number of houses?

Perhaps my brother has just been protecting himself, so when he hits the big time he won't have to support his poor, starving, baby-sister writer.

The truth is he has probably never forgiven me for that time I threw a rock at his eye. Yeah, like he didn't deserve it... .I don't know why he still holds a grudge. The scar is hardly noticeable.

Come to think of it, since he's already cemented into this "house/maid deal" with Mom, he won't have to support me. I'll just live with good old Mom for the rest of my life. I'm sure she'd love that. "Yeah... .Right!"

Area Theatrical Groups Announce Programs

BY RAMONA HUPP
The Fluff Meister

It looks to be an interesting season in the arts. Wilmington is certainly taking great strides in bringing diverse and entertaining events to its patrons.

This year will be the twenty-first season for UNCW's own Kenan Hall Auditorium. In celebration of this occasion, they will bring you an array of events. They will kick off the celebration with a benefit featuring Ivory and Steel Jazz with a Caribbean influence. Kenan Hall will also be the host of this year's annual North Carolina Shakespeare Festival with five performances of "As You Like It" starting in late October to November. "A Midsummer Night's Dream" will also be staged in December.

And what sounds to be a special treat will be the performance of Merani!. This dance troupe consists of boys and girls from the National Children's Folk Dance Ensemble of Tbilisi, Soviet Georgia. They will perform a program of folkloric and ritual dances inspired by the Georgian's two thousand year history.

Thalian Hall has also announced a new series of plays that will be in addition to their regular season. Included in this new series will be "Come Back To The 5 and Dime, Jimmy Dean, Jimmy Dean", "Beyond Therapy" and "The Effect of Gamma Rays on Man in the Moon Marigolds."

Also performing this semester at Thalian Hall will be the Tannahill Weavers, Scotland's legendary folk band, and a dance/theatre work based on the life of artist Minnie Evans called "Praise House."

And on campus at Kenan Hall's SRO Theatre UNCW students will be staging "Macbeth", "Twelfth Night", and "House of Blue Leaves".

As always, we will do our best to inform you when these events, and more, are taking place.

Billyclub Fest consists of Erik Tomosunas, Brett Ekstrom, Alex Bruton, Tom Landrigan and Steve Anthony (not necessarily in that order).

BCF Rules Stage With Iron Fists

BY KEVIN POTTS
Contributing Writer

Slam! Light slaps your eyes. A funky, crunchy groove cranks your ears. Like a puppet you are forced to move by five fellas who mean business and rule the stage with iron fists. This is the typical reaction one experiences when Billyclub Fest crams their atmospherically fresh funk and thrashy hip-hop sound down the throats of many startled listeners.

"Cram" is exactly what they do during their non-stop, highly energetic stage show that involves the crowd from the very first note. Crowd involvement has always been an important aspect for Billyclub Fest because it strengthens the unity within this "family band".

Billyclub Fest became a family immediately following their unification in January, 1990. Since then, they have been putting together a song list that is second to none for hard-hitting rhythm and groove. One of the reasons for the unique sound which they produce is their wide variety of musical influences ranging from Sly & The Family Stone, James Brown, all the way to Metallica, The Cocteau Twins, Fishbone and back. Their greatest influences however, are drawn from current social issues and problems to which each person in the audience can relate.

This culmination of a brutally entertaining stage show, soulfully orchestrated music and stimulating social awareness proves to be an event not to be missed.

Billyclub Fest will perform at the Mad Monk on Thursday night.

Don't Be A Stranger To Good Company

BY ZACHARY BISACKY
Entertainment Writer

For most college students, seeing a film about a bunch of old women stranded in Canada would be about as enjoyable as reading an economics textbook on a Saturday night. And, having to make a two-hour drive to Chapel Hill to view it would be as equally dreadful. This, however, is what I did and have not one regret about doing so.

The movie, Strangers in Good Company, is writer/director Cynthia Scott's absorbing account of seven elderly women who are in search of a house in which one of the ladies was raised. Upon discovery of the squalid and barren place, their vehicle incurs engine difficulties, leaving them stranded in the middle of the country. With this Robinson-Crusoe predicament, the women are able to insignificantly reveal their past and present lives to one another and it is at this point that the film becomes realistically enchanting and electric.

Unprecedented in recent film history, Scott comprises an entire cast that is without any prior dramatic experience. This produces acting that is so natural it seems as though many of the scenes are improvised and the camera is merely a recorder giving it the characteristics of a documentary. This crossover of narrative and documentary is exemplified quite brilliantly by chronological photos of the women's lives that run sporadically throughout the film. Also, there isn't any one lead role; rather all the actresses are viewed with a refreshing equality that eliminates the star aspect most films feel necessary to embody.

The conversations that display each character's uniqueness are very intriguing, especially for someone younger who may have misconceptions of the elderly. They speak about topics such as marriage, social acceptance, and fear of death which makes one realize that these people have lives that anyone could relate to. Moreover, it breaks down several of the stereotypes old people are tagged with and actually presents them as exciting and humorous individuals.

The cinematography is a vibrant and expressive portrayal of the Canadian scenery, from the crisp and zesty sunrise photos to the romantic full-moon shots. It would be worth it alone to see this aspect of the film. The music corresponds to the cinematography by delivering a collection of symphonic tunes that help you digest the placid atmosphere. Interestingly, the music is omitted from the intense climatic scenes and key conversations, which allows the movie to draw realistic emotions from the viewer instead of relying on heart-breaking dirges to draw tears.

The last and most important reason why you should rush out and see this witty and compassionate film is because it will be pulled from circulation around September 12 (for more information contact Rialto Theater at 856-8683 or Chelsea Theater at 929-8428). Ironically, Disney has bought the rights and plans to recast actress Jessica Tandy (Driving Miss Daisy) in a different version.

To think that this film could not stand on its own without a professional film company backing it with experienced actresses is completely ludicrous. Unfortunately, Hollywood feels that it can make more money by throwing a few famous names into the credits and be able to maintain the originality the film had. In the case of any other movie this scheme might work, but in the case of Strangers in Good Company it is sure to destroy the pioneering quality the original offers.

"Quote Of The Week"

"They're completely motivated by money. And the quality of the work is not really relevant, except that they quite like to go to the Academy Awards and know they've got a couple of nominations. It's very, very shallow."

Alan Parker's (director of The Commitments, Pink Floyd: The Wall, Midnight Express, etc.) opinion of many Hollywood studio heads. (Premiere Magazine)

WLOZ's Top Ten List

UNCW's radio station dictates the music you should listen to

After repeatedly trying to get a top ten list from these guys I gave up. I even warned them that if I didn't get one, I would make one up! So here goes. You will probably never hear any of these on WLOZ, but then again if they don't ever get a play list going anarchy could take over... .Stay Tuned. Donny and Marie Osmond's Greatest Hits- Includes the infamous "I'm Leavin' It All Up To You, Puppy Love" and Marie's stirring rendition of Make The World Go Away. A true classic.

SGA-UPDATE

SPOTLIGHTS

Public Affairs Committee

Committee Head: Line Dempsey

Contact: Anyone interested in becoming involved with this committee should contact any committee member or call the SGA office at, 395-3553

The Public Affairs Committee meets periodically throughout the semester when the need arises for the entire committee to assemble. Each member however, spends one hour a week in the SGA office or around campus working on promotional projects. The Committee is also responsible for SGA Update which appears each week in The Seahawk.

Goal: Our goal is to make Student Government a voice that the student population will listen to and interact with.

Committee Members: Sarah McKeon, Christine Jenket, Sharon Douglas, Katrina Crawley

note:

Each week in The Seahawk, the Student Government buys one page to update the student body on all Student Government sponsored activities and events. The Public Affairs Committee is responsible for this publication and would like to take advantage of this space to recognize one member of the S.G.A. each week as well as one S.G.A. sponsored committee or organization.

Kelli Shafer, S.G.A. Vice-President

Kelli has served on S.G.A. since 1989 and has served as chairwoman to the Budget Planning Committee and has also served on the Bookstore/Union Board. Kelli's personal goal is, "...to make S.G.A. a team, to work together for the student body."

In the past Kelli has created an Orientation Committee, and delegated more responsibilities to individual class officers among many other accomplishments. In the future Kelli intends to continue "...working closely with committee heads, committees and senators, requiring senators to sit on a committee or serve as a liaison to a club or organization."

Kelli feels that communication is much improved this year due to the new P.I.O. and she sees the Student Government Association Constitution as the one thing that needs the most attention in the S.G.A.

Take A Faculty/Staff to Lunch

This year SGA will be implementing a new program titled "Take a Faculty/Staff to Lunch." The program, which began August 22, originated out of an attempt to promote communication and awareness between the students and the faculty/staff.

Each week the Housing and Food Services will donate 10 meals to be used at any on-campus dining facility; the cafeteria, Hawk's nest or Center Stage Cafe.

In order to treat a faculty/staff member, students must sign up in the SGA office a week prior to the luncheon engagement. All Students are eligible to participate but are responsible for the cost of their own meal.

YOU'RE INVITED!

Our Student Government office has taken on a few new changes over the summer, and you are cordially invited to come by and visit. Not only did we paint the walls, we even moved some of the furniture around. Along with the physical changes, there are also some social changes. Curtis Wilson, the Student Body President, is urging the members of Student Government to spend more time in the office. By this act, students are encouraged to come by and ask questions and visit with people involved with SGA. This will try to bridge the gap that has been created between students and the people that represent them. In order for this theory to work we need you to come by.

College Officials Question New SAT Format

BY AMY REYNOLDS
College Press Service

Admissions counselors across the country are waiting to see whether the revised Scholastic Achievement Test will reflect students' abilities, especially those of minorities, more accurately.

The College Board, which administers the SAT, will publish the new version in 1994.

"We're eagerly awaiting it," said Joyce Smith, associate executive director of the National Association of College Admission Counselors. "Most of us want to know how the changes will affect the results."

SAT results have been the talk of academia this week after the release of the 1991 national average scores which dropped two points each to 422 in the verbal section and 474 in the math section.

In his release of that information, College Board president Donald Stewart said the scores reflected "a disturbing pattern of educational disparity."

That disparity mostly involves African-American and Hispanic minorities, who still fall short of scores achieved by whites and Asian-Americans. Still, African-Americans and Mexican-Americans are the leading groups for steady increases in their scores.

"Every time you see a standardized test result from a black student, the average score will be lower than the majority's score," said Walter Jacobs, director of academic support services for the College Board, at a recent educational conference in Orlando, Fla. "Some people say this is just another example that the black man can't cut it. ... On the other hand, we see that blacks are the one group constantly progressing toward better scores."

Educators hope the new test will help close some of the gap. The 1991 test averages showed the following:

Since 1976, African-Americans and Mexican-Americans have shown an overall point increase of 50 and 23 points respectively. But, their overall average score still falls about 200 and 130 points shy, respectively, of scores achieved by whites and Asians. Their total average scores are 930 and 940 respectively.

Scores achieved by whites overall have dropped 11 points since 1976. The overall average for all groups taken together — 896 — has dropped seven points. Men still score higher than women (923 average vs. 861 average), especially in the mathematics section of the test.

Students who took more academic classes during their educational careers scored about 50 points higher than the national average in both the verbal and math sections.

"Those who took physics, for example, had average verbal scores of 464 and average math scores of 538, considerably above the national averages for each," said Robert Cameron, the board's senior research associate. "Those who took calculus had the highest math average, 599, and the highest verbal average, 502."

Cameron says the College Board is concerned about an apparent paradox — "We are seeing more years of study in academics and in college prep courses and still the average scores are going down."

Much of the drop comes from the higher percentage of minorities taking the test — this year 28 percent of test-takers were minorities. Of that 28 percent, 8 percent reported that English was their second language and another 8 percent reported they were bilingual.

"As more of our society is being included in the test, the more likely you are to see scores decline," Cameron said.

That greater inclusion and the SAT's inability to reflect different cultures in its test question content has helped spark the exam's rewrite.

"There's always been some suspicion about the way the test questions are written," Smith said. "The College Board now has established a review board for minority education that looks at items for bias against women and ethnic groups."

That board has existed for many years and the content of questions has slowly changed to reflect more cultural diversity, Cameron said.

The new test will not only show more changes in content, but also changes in form.

In its first format change since 1975, the test will abandon its antonym, or opposite word, questions for beefed-up reading sections that will put more emphasis on higher-order reading skills, Cameron said. He calls it critical reading.

In the math section, the primary change will involve the addition of a section where students generate their own answers to problems rather than picking an answer from the traditional multiple choice format.

While College Board officials are working on the changes, they stand by their claim that the SAT, the primary test used in 22 East and West Coast states for college entrance, is an accurate reflection of a student's academic ability.

The American College Testing Program, another college admissions test known as ACT, is used predominantly in 28 states. ACT officials will release their 1991 average scores on Sept. 17.

"The bottom line is that the College Board has always said their test scores are extremely accurate, but what we find is that admissions offices look at academic records first," Smith said. "Some kids test well and some panic and blow it."

First Aid Enters Dorm Rooms

From College Press Service

Ironically, about two years ago, when many concerns about student health care and its cost surfaced, a College-Aid Health Care Kit emerged for students to keep in their dormitory rooms or apartments.

Its sales have tripled this year, perhaps underscoring the concerns parents and students have about their health.

The kit, designed by S.D. Salvi, came about because "I went back to school when I was older and I saw students asking me all kinds of health questions. I just felt that kids knew absolutely nothing about health care."

The kit sells for $19.95 and includes a 60-page health care guide along with a thermometer, antihistamine, pain/fever reducer, bandages, antibiotic ointment, an elastic bandage wrap and an ice pack. Condoms are optional.

Many colleges and universities are looking to incorporate the kits into their residential life programs — many have ordered kits for their resident assistants and would like all students living on campus to have one.

All of these creative solutions are helping to provide continued medical services to students in an environment where administrators

"do not see health care in the mainstream of academics," Peters said.

He added that student health care services are essential because they are one of the only options of low-cost medical treatment for students without insurance or for students from low-income families.

"I think for the next decade health centers will be under the microscope. ... Presidents keep asking, 'Why? Why do we need health care for students?'"

"If you can maintain the cost of the care yourself," he says, "you won't have administrators trying to eliminate you."

Recycling Center Opens On Campus

BY BETH CAPPS
News Writer

The UNCW Recycling Center has opened its doors for a semester of recycling and conservation. The center, located at the back of campus, accepts clear glass, plastic, newspaper and aluminum cans. Towana Moore, Recycling Coordinator, said she is excited about the center opening and looks forward to a successful year with the students. "The main reason (for the center) is to get the students involved, so I hope it has a good impact on them."

Moore said if students are interested in the center, they should contact Michael McDonald at the Discovery Center in the University Center. Other students can get involved by collecting all the plastic and other recyclable items from fellow students and carrying them to the center.

As for students, the impact of recycling has brought a positive response. Freshman Jessica Birch said "I think it's very good and I think it should be mandatory because it is cutting down on the amount of waste we use." Andy Marshall, a student agreed. "I agree with it so that we don't use up the Earth's resources."

Campus Health Care Seeks Funding

BY AMY REYNOLDS
College Press Service

A university without an English department is impossible to imagine. Unfortunately, officials from colleges across the country say the absence of campus health care and counseling is not considered equally as absurd.

As a result, student health clinics are trying to find alternative sources of funding. Many counseling services could be ended as a result of budget cuts administrators warn.

"There is a change in mood on university campuses across the country," said Dr. Donald Peters, director of the University of Minnesota's Health Services.

That mood is not a health-conscious one.

"As state and federal funding decreases, tuitions increase. Because schools are trying to keep their total costs as low as possible, some fees, like health fees, are not escalated to maintain service," said Dr. Verna Armstrong, senior educational resources consultant with the American Association of State Colleges and Universities.

Most student health centers across the country are supported primarily by student fees. The remainder of the money comes from university funding and third-party insurance. Insurance money is collected from non-student patients using the student health centers for medical care.

Most university counseling services, such as rape crisis centers, drug and alcohol treatment programs and educational programs for AIDS, eating disorders and stress, do not fall under the health services umbrella.

Instead, they are funded primarily by each university with minimal money coming from fees. In times of financial strain, counseling programs are usually the first to get cut.

"This is the 1990s," Peters said. "We are not just Band-aids centers. There are an incredible number of services students need. Unfortunately those programs, the ones peripheral to health care, are always the first to go."

Already this year budget problems at Stanford University have resulted in the school ignoring a task force recommendation to hire someone to run its sexual assault services.

The University of Florida has suffered cuts in its rape counseling and victim advocate services as well.

"People really need to have these programs to deal with what's going on," said Lt. Sadie Darnell, spokeswoman for the Gainesville Police Department.

At Rutgers University a recommendation by a task force resulted in the hiring of a person to run the school's sexual assault services. But, the school has reduced funds for its alcohol treatment program.

"I think there's a general feeling of considerable vulnerability because classroom activities won't be cut," said Dr. David Burns, Rutgers' assistant vice president for student life. "Many people feel these services are essential. We see them as linked to education but many institutions just hold instruction at the top."

In Washington, the government is getting involved in the issue as well.

Selena Dong, legislative consultant for the United States Student Association, a lobbying group for student concerns, said USSA is working on trying to get federal money earmarked for rape counseling services.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-N.J., recently worked with the Senate Judiciary Committee to get a bill passed that provides some federal money to colleges that agree to make sexual assault statistics public information.

"I think that's great," said Burns. "But I don't think the government is going to come up

With many are contemplating the fate of counseling services, health administrators are scrambling to come up with their own methods of earning money.

Dr. William Broyles, administrator of the Student Health Center at Mississippi State University, recently shared his school's success at the American College Health Association's annual meeting.

Broyles said Mississippi State is allowing private doctors to practice at the student health center. The center then charges the physician an overhead cost for using the facilities.

Also, the student health center is providing low-cost health care, such as physicals for non-students, and is reducing the cost of X-rays and other tests by having them performed at outside laboratories.

Peters adds, "What major institutions have to do is use the inner structure (of health care centers) to include health care for employees, faculty, staff and others to gain revenue." By adding these non-student patients to the list, university health centers can receive increased insurance money for payment of services.

"Because we are self-supported, we have to generate our own revenue," Broyles said. "It's strictly market-driven. The more patients, the more money."

Another option for some schools is "trying to help by offering group insurance plans to students," Armstrong said.

Ironically, about two years ago, when many concerns about student health care and its cost surfaced, a College-Aid Health Care Kit emerged for students to keep in their dormitory rooms or apartments.

Its sales have tripled this year, perhaps underscoring the concerns parents and students have about their health.

'Rat Olympics' May Change Name

BY KAREN NEUSTADT
College Press Service

Rats! When the Rat Olympics were founded at Kalamazoo College five years ago, students had no idea they were doing anything, well, un-American.

But in late August, 22 student trainers and 11 rodent athletes (rathletes) from Kalamazoo College were blasted into the national spotlight when someone, er, ratted on them to the U.S. Olympics Committee.

An item on the rat games appeared in a syndicated column, then was picked up by USA Today. CNN wanted to cover the event. It was Big Time for the Rat Olympics, an annual event sponsored by the psychology department to teach students more about the training of research rats.

However, the Olympics Committee smelled a ... you-know-what ... and told the school to change the name of the event. "I think associating the Olympics with rats is not in our best interest," Olympic Committee lawyer Bert Faiberg told The Associated Press.

Public outcry was swift.

Television, radio and newspaper reporters swarmed the campus. Lyn Raible, professor of psychology and natural sciences and founder of the Rat Olympics, was overwhelmed with interview requests. Contests to rename the event took the campus by storm.

The Olympics Committee remained unmoved. Undaunted, the rat supporters decided on a name for next year's games: The Kalamazoo College Rathletic Games.

The six-inch star rodents (Sidney, Tarzan, Bo Jackson, Kermit, Spock, Bud, Burt, Maximilian, Seymour, Sam and Stanley) had their moment of glory, however, when they appeared on CBS Morning News — not to mention Japanese and Spanish-speaking television.

The adopted rats trained for six weeks for a grueling series of competitive events, including a tiny high bar, hurdles, a little obstacle course, and soccer. Student trainers showed off with an "open trick," a freestyle event designed by them.

The Aug. 29 competition began with the parade of rathletes, accompanied by their trainers. A torch-carrying student, outfitted in pointed ears and a tail, accompanied Raible, who carried the Oreos (the gold medals) used to reward the rodents.

Tarzan, in a spectacular display of rathlete skill, was the hands-down favorite. In a tiny loincloth, he wowed the crowd with a trick that made rat game history.

Tarzan dashed up a ladder into a tree, scurried over a rope bridge, down a platform, then jumped into a fake pond and rescued a toy Jane from the jaws of an alligator.

After appearing on CBS, Tarzan was seen munching oatmeal cream pies and cereal, the breakfast of rat champions. His student trainers, Candi Jones and Meredith Bigelow, won a free dinner and an evening in a hot tub — sans Tarzan.

Seymour, however, didn't fare as well. He won the Wimpy Rat award. "He choked in all his affairs," says Raible, explaining that trainers Andrea Miller and Jennifer Renkowski both won two-month memberships at a local gym.

Other spectacular tricks included a rathlete that could rob a bank, one that could shoot baskets, and another that rescued a damsel in distress. One year a student built a scale model of the Empire State Building and trained his rat to climb it and rescue a miniature King Kong.

Competing rats, say officials, are usually not returned to the laboratory but are adopted as pets by their student trainers.

"They're really sweet animals," insists Raible.

Seahawks Learn Lessons At Home

BY PATRICK FOWLER
Sports Editor

"We learn a lot."

That was the phrase repeated more than once from players and coaches on the University of North Carolina at Wilmington Lady Seahawks volleyball team, following a four team round robin tournament competition last weekend in Hanover Hall.

The Seahawks (1-2) hosted squads in the University of North Carolina's sister school system. Teams from UNC-Asheville (2-1), UNC-Charlotte (0-3), and UNC-Chapel Hill (3-0) took part in this two day competition that began Friday evening.

The Tar Heels captured the championship trophy by dropping only one game the entire tournament. Three Tar Heel players, setter Amy Peistrup and outside hitters, Natalie Andrews and Joanna Sahn were named to the All-Tournament team.

UNCW's setter, Sheldon Plentovich, also made the squad as did UNCA's middle striker, Ilona Fekete. This was the first time the Tar Heels, 49ers, or Bulldogs had every player in Wilmington.

The UNC's Tournament began with the Seahawks facing the 49ers at 6 p.m. The Tar Heels squared off against the Bulldogs of Asheville at 8 p.m.

In game one, UNCW dropped its opening game 12-15.

However, the Seahawks battled back winning the next three games to take the match 15-9, 15-5, 15-5.

Seniors Kim Cavanaugh, Leslie Knauss, and junior Plentovich played an exceptional games for UNCW. Cavanaugh recorded 10 blocks for the Seahawks while Plentovich dished out 31 assists.

"We were free-flowing out there on the court," Cavanaugh said. "We were up so high it was incredible. Everything we did seem to click."

Unfortunately for the Seahawks the feeling only lasted the evening.

The Seahawks dropped the morning contest to UNCA 10-15, 6-15, 7-15 and fell again in the afternoon tilt to the Heels 4-15, 6-15, 4-15.

"Today (Saturday) it was more mumbo jumbo out there," Cavanaugh said. "It wasn't that we were playing badly as a team but individually we had our mental breakdowns."

Timing and lack of communication, which were not evident on Thursday, played havoc in the Seahawks' play calling. Setters and hitters were out of sync with one another as the UNCW defense had to scramble to cover errors set up by the Seahawk attackers.

Mental toughness, as well, appeared missing at times as UNCW could not string together Seahawk outside hitter Jennifer Jamieson (4) skies to tip the ball over the outstretched hands of her Tarheel opponent. UNCW fell to Chapel Hill in three straight games, 4-15, 6-15, 4-15.

more than four point straight.

"Keeping your intensity out on the court is a full time job," head coach Kathy McDaniel said.

"I knew, going in, that because of our youth and the fact that we've only practiced together for a week, there was a good chance we would be erratic out there."

"This is also one of the toughest opening schedules we've ever had. In past years we've started out easy and built up our team to peak at the Conference Championships."

"This is a new approach for us this season and I won't be able to weight its effects until later down the season."

Seahawk middle hitter, Cavanaugh, agreed with McDaniel but emphasized that there were still 31 games left in the season to play.

"We don't have the confidence in ourselves that we should," Cavanaugh said. "That quality will come over time."

"We don't like to lose but we aren't too disappointed with our 1-2 record. Volleyball is a team sport and we have to get to the point where we click with each other every time out."

UNCW faces Coastal Carolina in a non-conference match Wednesday in Trask. The Seahawks may be without the service of outsider hitter Jennifer Jamieson. Jamieson is suffering from a sore neck.

The student body is one of the top priorities on new athletic director Paul Miller's agenda in his first season at UNCW.

"I want the students to know one of the main reason we have an athletic department is to serve and promote student involvement in university activities," Miller said. "I want students to be excited about coming to UNCW and the sports it participates in."

Miller's first step in accomplishing this goal is the introduction of a Seahawk spirit club on campus, to be known as the "Trask Force". The Force was unveiled at Wednesday's Student Volunteer Fair. Athletic personnel asked students to sign-up for officer positions in the pep committee. Those chosen are given a colorful tee shirt with camouflage lettering spelling out the group's name.

The officers will be in charge of recruiting new members, planning and promoting fan involvement, and bringing students' concerns about the athletic department to Miller and his staff.

Membership in the new organization will also have its perks.

Currently in the works for the group are giving the Trask faithful a special seating area for home contest and priority in buying tickets to popular events, like the UNCW vs. East Carolina games. Additionally, Miller hopes to increase student interest in athletic events with special halftime giveaways and entertainment.

"I don't want to reveal everything we're planning on doing this year," Miller said. "Some projects we are still trying to confirm. What I can promise you is a fun if not exciting two semesters."

"One of my main goal this year is recapturing the student body at UNCW. I want our athletic teams to have the same home court advantage as other schools in our league. If you can't capture the school spirit with the students, you can't hope to get it elsewhere."

Miller, 51, was the final selection of a 10-person search committee that began interviewing applicants to replace outgoing A.D. William Brooks last August. After 160 interviews and several weeks of second and third looks at candidates, Miller was offered the position in early July. Miller was then employed at Louisiana Tech University as the Assistant to the President for Athletics.

Miller's style is different from his predecessor, for it is a more hands on approach. He draws ideas and information from every available source around him.

"I told my staff right away I didn't care what their title was," Miller said. "I wanted to hear their ideas. I want them to take part in the brainstorming in this office."

"I've always had an open-door policy wherever I've worked. All of my staff is important to me. I'm not here to make this 'Paul Miller's domain'. I'm here like everyone else to work and serve UNCW."

Miller wastes no time getting down to business. In the few months he has been in the position he has already approved the women's basketball locker room change from Hanover Hall to Trask Coliseum and helped name assistant baseball coach Mark Seale to the skipper position following the resignation of former manager, Bobby Guthrie.

Mr. Miller has also set in motion an upgrade process to improve the facilities in his athletic program making them comparable to that of other teams in the Seahawks' conference, the Colonial.

"I want to give coaches what they need to be competitive out on the court," Miller said. "I especially like to see our women's basketball program take off. I've talked to coach (Sheri) Tynes and we're both excited about the upcoming season."

A new era has begun at UNCW. It's Miller time.

giant heaves after every point.

Yet there was fire still burning in those 39-year old eyes. A flame that refused to be extinguished, no matter how low the fuel to keep it going, if any, remained.

And he came back.

Oh, lord did he come back.

Winning one point at a time.

He screamed at officials. He went to the towel to wipe the perspiration from his racket. He joked with the crowd to ease the tension.

He clawed.

He scrapped.

He lunged himself at volleys that most players would let pass them.

He battled back and he won, celebrating his 3-6, 7-6 (10-8), 1-6, 6-3, 7-6 (7-4) victory and birthday with number one salutes to a sold out crowd on its feet.

"It was a war," Connors said afterwards "I was lucky enough to win."

Luck had nothing to do with it.

Tennis fans were used to seeing greatness when this man walked on the court. However, after four or five years of sub-par play, even the most loyal supporters sensed that the Connors' era was finally over.

Yet the magic was reborn in the French Open. A arena that is notoriously supportive from the home team, turn suddenly on their countrymen in support of the old brash American. It was here, almost as a farce, that Connors chose to make his break from the broadcasting booth and back on to center court. He went back to the game for the same reason a has-been actor would to the theater, to snell the greasepaint of the backstage just one more time.

And he surprised even himself, reaching the third round, beating players who were dimes when he won his first title. He barely missed making the quarterfinals, failing not in his tennis strokes but in his health. His body refused to play another fifth set match (Connors played a five-setter in the first round) against an aggressive, not to mention speedy, Michael Chang. Yet like a warrior he fired the final shot of the match, winning it, and then retired with his dignity intact.

He continued his comeback in Wimbledon, still opening eyes of disbelievers who had long written him off and labeled his recent success in the French, a fluke. Yet, one could see his heart working on his mind.

It seemed to say, "Hey you still compete out here with these guys."

So he worked himself back into shape, revisiting practice courts early in the morning, hitting with younger players to increase his reaction time, and lifting weights to improve his strength on his serve. He had to be prepare himself for the power tennis of the nineties.

He entered the U.S. Open as a wild card, hoping to make it pass the first round. He nearly failed in that endeavor, but battled back from two sets down to defeat Patrick McEnroe, John's little brother, in five. Some top-ranked professionals, like Boris Becker, congratulated with handshakes, others with admiration from afar. All paid their respects to the legend whose shadow seems to grow bigger and bigger.

John McEnroe was asked by CBS sportscaster Leslie Visser why he was retiring after one more season. Connors after all stayed well past his prime and was still able to compete with much younger players. He summed up Belleville, Illinois slugger simply.

"Jimmy is one of the few athletes I've ever seen that truly loves his sport with a passion. It is that passion that drives him to do play the way he does on the court. I don't have that strong passion for tennis. I wish I did."

Connors was used to miracles. The warrior in him thrived on battling against the odds. The strategist in him sent him to the sidelines' towels 84 times, to the cheering shouts from the crowd, to the net again and again.

Connors won his service game to pull the match to 5-3 and then he dug in his heels for the crucial battle. The Believer bomber attacked the net with a vengeance rushing at every opportunity. Connors stared down the forehead cannon of the Grande Point native with hatred in his eyes, daring him to try to stroke a passing shot by him.

"He'll have to pass me 66 times this set," Connors screamed to himself during the struggle. Indeed, Connors' serve and volley tactics enable him to make the points shorter, saving his energy for the long baseline rally when he couldn't force his way to the net.

It was this extra energy that pushed the final set into a tie-breaker and allow Connors to put the final touches on a great comeback with one of his patented two-handed backhand volley winners.

"He hit some great shots," an exhausted and disappointed Krickstein said. "Normally I have a lot of crowd support. But Jimmy is a legend, a great player. I understand."

We all do. The myth lives on.

'3-2 Krickstein.'

That was the score the umpire bellowed from his high chair, eight feet above the center court battlefield at Flushing Meadow National Tennis Center in New York.

That was the result of a 24-year old blistering backhand that handcuffed his 15-year senior at the net in a match that was well past four hours old.

That was the bleak outlook that caused many to shake their heads and hurry to the exits hoping to beat the U.S. Open's traffic home.

And it was the heart and passion of one tired but determined old veteran that sent all them dashing back to their seats.

James Scott Connors was down. Two sets to one. His leg muscles were spasming. His angles were tilted. His lungs were gasping for oxygen in

Financial Aid Looking Better

BY JARET SEIBERG
CPS Washington Correspondent

WASHINGTON — Students soon may find more grants in their financial aid packages.

Higher education associations have been fighting to expand grant eligibility while simultaneously arguing that a decade-long trend toward loan-based aid should end. Their battle will climax this fall when Congress rewrites the Higher Education Act, the blueprint for all federal aid programs.

National student leaders say the battle can be won if students are willing to join the fray.

"It is going to be an incredibly tough battle and you need to call your congressmen," said Selena Dong, legislative director of the United States Student Association.

The House Postsecondary Education subcommittee led the reauthorization effort, holding more than 45 hearings during the past two years.

The subcommittee has finished its hearings and is expected to begin marking up the bill early this fall. Mark-up is the crucial phase for all bills. That's when congressional representatives go over the bill section by section, proposing new rules to replace ones they do not agree with.

When the subcommittee finishes, the House Postsecondary Education and Labor committee will examine the bill before it goes to the full House for debate. Any section of the bill can be amended at any point in the process.

The Senate also will begin later this fall marking up its version of the Higher Education Act. When the House and Senate pass their versions of the act, a conference committee will try to combine the two bills into one, which must be approved by both houses.

Dong said this mark-up process gives students a chance to fight for proposals they favor, such as switching financial aid emphasis from loans to grants.

"A lot of people say, 'What difference does it make to call your congressman?' But a lot of changes have to be made and congressmen do read their mail," Dong said.

USSA, the primary student-run lobbying organization, has been pushing to expand Pell grant eligibility to families with incomes up to $49,000 and to re-open the Stafford loan program to all students, regardless of income. It also wants to increase Pell grant awards and to make them an entitlement, which would protect them from budget cuts.

The group included these recommendations in a 25-page proposal that it submitted to the subcommittee.

"We want to make sure that middle income students get Pell grants and are eligible for Stafford loans," Dong said. "We don't want to create a system where only the very poorest and the very richest students can go to college."

The Education Department and the Bush administration are proposing more modest changes. Their recommendations, delivered to Congress earlier this summer, would expand the maximum Pell grant from $2,400 to $3,700, but it would restrict the grants to the neediest students.

Suggestion Box Open

BY BRENDA BURNELL
News Writer

Is there some type of suggestion you would like to voice about UNCW? Well, there is a place here on campus that students, faculty, visitors—basically anyone—can make a beneficial suggestion. That place is the Chancellor's Suggestion Box, located in the University Center outside the post office.

Forms are provided at the box, and ask for such information as your name (which is optional, but a name must be included to be considered for an award), address or department, city, state, zip, and status. All suggestions are kept confidential. However, these suggestions are coded in a computer file so if a suggestion is used, a person may be identified to receive the reward.

These rewards are given if a suggestion is picked which is beneficial to the school. Some of the rewards are: Bookstore Gift Certificates, movie tickets from the SGA, Seahawk Basketball tickets, and cash prizes (for university state employees only).

One of the main purposes of this suggestion box is to "improve communication on campus," said Chancellor James R. Leutze. So far this year the suggestion box has had a "good response," he said.

Most of the issues have been about parking and on how to reduce the parking problems in a positive way. Suggestions are judged on merit or what will benefit the school and most suggestions are acted upon. Suggestions are taken out of the box everyday.

Education Lab Provides Experience

BY BETH CAPPS
News Writer

UNCW has a special training facility for students interested in education. The Education Lab, located in King Hall, is a special requirement for students signed up to take certain courses. Students who are taking these courses are required to work one-on-one with children at the lab in areas such as reading, math and special education. Students working with special education kids are asked to take diagnostic evaluations of the kids as they progress.

Barbara Honchell, director of the lab, says that according to surveys taken to evaluate the students, "College students respond that the lab allows them to tie everything in with the children." As far as the children are concerned, Honchell claims that the children's responses are positive to the lab and its programs.

The lab is opened for the children Monday through Thursday, 3:00 pm to 6:00 pm, the students are given until that time to complete their lesson plan and get them approved. There are approximately 250 students enrolled in the lab per semester.

Flag Ceremony Today ROTC Leaves Campus

BY JENNIFER WILSON
News Writer

UNCW's Army Reserve Officer Training Corps is closing because of budget cuts within the university. The program's closure will be finalized within the next few weeks.

The decision to eliminate the ROTC program was based on a computer study conducted in January 1990. This study was based "strictly on numbers," says Lieutenant Colonel Leroy Hanna.

Hanna feels the closure is unfortunate because the program produces a better quality of officers than many of the programs that were not eliminated.

Freshmen and sophomores on scholarship had two choices: to quit ROTC or to transfer to another school. If the tuition is higher at another school, the Army has agreed to pay the difference.

Students contracted last year will be allowed to continue their studies at UNCW until graduation. Most of these are juniors and seniors.

Last year some of the cadets had to take two years of military science courses to prepare for the closure of the program. These same cadets are now taking regular courses for graduation.

Cadet Steve Bliven said the elimination of ROTC had little effect on his studies. Bliven had finished the military science courses before the decision was made. He will be commissioned in December.

"It decreased morale for the juniors," Bliven said. "As a senior, you become a cadet officer and get an opportunity to train the juniors." His class was the last to do this.

Bliven and the other cadets continuing at UNCW until graduation have the obligation of keeping up with their studies, physical fitness and military tactics they have learned at such places as Fort Bragg, NC.

Cadet Tom Burkett said "It disappoints me that we're losing the program. It's done a lot for me with the discipline and everything."

The students were not the only ones dealt a change of scenery by the elimination of the ROTC. The staff has been reassigned to other positions within the Army.

Freshman Orientation Colleges Make Changes

BY KAREN NEUSTADT
College Press Service

Say goodbye to boring campus tours — freshman orientation is becoming a downright adventure. From milking cows to whitewater rafting trips, colleges are coming up with creative new ways to ease the freshman willies.

Faced with crowded campuses, students from diverse cultural backgrounds, and social issues such as date rape, AIDS and alcohol abuse, many colleges and universities are focusing on strong orientation programs to bring unity and inspiration to incoming freshmen.

While outdoor adventures for new students are gaining popularity on some campuses, other schools find one-to-one bonding among advisers and students equally effective. Some schools include parents in the orientation process, while others encourage freshmen to involve themselves in volunteer projects.

"Orientation is also a time for parents to think of separation in a way that's positive, not in a way that promotes fears," says Kate Greenfield, dean of academic programs at Albright College.

At Sterling College in Craftsbury Common, Vt., officials believe that challenging outdoor activities help academic study. First-year students, known as "grassrooters," get acquainted through morning orientation activities during the first week of classes. They arise each day after dawn and break into groups for outdoor tasks.

Challenges include morning farm chores such as milking cows, woodlot jobs, roping and hauling logs and building cross country ski bobs. The week is closed with a night hike over the nearby Lowell Mountains.

"Seeing the dawn is a new experience for most of them," said Sarabelle Hitchner, director of admissions.

Another school, Kalamazoo College in Kalamazoo, Mich., boasts an orientation program called Land/Sea that is modeled after Outward Bound. Students experience the joys and frustrations of three weeks of group living in the wilderness as they engage in a vigorous round of hiking, canoeing, climbing and rappelling.

One week is spent learning how to sail a 60-foot brigantine around the Great Lakes while the other two are spent in the woods and bluffs of a nearby Canadian park. Officials say a bond is formed that lasts long after students return to campus for class.

For the 14th straight year, the Outing Club of Whitman College in Walla Walla, Wash., will offer "Whitman Scrambles" which consist of nine one-week trips scheduled for the last week of August and led by teams of upperclassmen. Only six to 10 freshmen go on each trip that may include whitewater rafting, backpacking, camping or biking. The trips are sponsored by the Outing Club and run about $150 per trip.

At St. Lawrence University in Canton, N.Y., orientation is preceded by optional "pre-trips" which consist of three-day, limited enrollment outdoor adventures in August that may include short hikes for beginners, a challenging trek across Mount Marshall for skilled outdoorsmen and a hiking and camping trip to Armstrong Mountain.

Some orientation programs are tailor-made for individual students. For example, Carthage College in Kenosha, Wis., matches incoming students with a freshman adviser who knows the student's history, educational background and interests. Unlike most colleges that provide part-time advisers, Carthage freshman advisers are full-time employees.

Another college, Baldwin Wallace College in Berea, Ohio, offers an innovative course to all incoming freshmen. It's a full-semester orientation course worth three credit hours and is taken by more than 75 percent of the freshmen.

Entitled "College 101," the course is taught to small classes by 20 trained faculty members who design their own curriculums. The popular course relies on research concerning student retention and homesickness study skills. There are lively discussions on topics like date rape, alcohol abuse and getting along with one's roommates.

The "Albright Unity" program at Albright College in Reading, Pa., brings students from diverse backgrounds together. As part of the program, which begins during orientation, freshmen from farm communities, foreign countries and urban environments are brought together with Albright student leaders. Students are encouraged to discuss and compare their diverse backgrounds.

Two weeks after classes begin, the students go on a retreat to discuss their impressions of student life. Other mixers are scheduled during the school year such as an international dinner sponsored by the foreign students.

It's Enough To Make Labor Unions Viable Options

As the citizens of Hamlet, NC try to recover from the tragic explosion at the now infamous chicken processing plant, government officials and others in the South are searching for answers about how such a mishap could occur.

A better question would ask why it doesn't occur more often. Actually it does.

On the average (in the South), three people are killed in the workplace every week. Almost one in four workers in the South will be injured on the job during their careers.

Here comes the best statistic of all: the average plant or factory is inspected for safety once every 75 years.

Knowing facts like these, it's not too hard to understand how the tragedy in Hamlet occurred.

Companies have been drawn to the South for a long time by promises of cheap labor and production costs. Industry has grown in the South largely because of practices which further diminish the cost of labor. These practices are essentially unchecked by any pro-labor force. Perhaps it's time for that.

Since the government obviously does not have the financial means or the inclination to guarantee the safety of the laborers, it seems imperative that the laborers form their own power.

Obviously, the lack of labor unions in the South has been a major contributor to the cheap labor and deplorable working conditions which mark southern factories.

While labor unions certainly don't provide all of the answers to the labor problems in the United States, they seem to be necessary as short-term solutions to the life-threatening greed shown by the management of industry in the region.

Letters to the Editor...

Dear Editor,

In the past few issues of The Seahawk, the on-campus Residence Halls have been repeatedly referred to as "dorms" and I would like to explain the difference for the editors and other readers who can not differentiate "dorms" from "residence halls". According to Webster's dictionary, dormitory is defined as "a room with beds for a number of people". This definition completely ignores the human factor involved in Residence Halls. A dorm is simply a physical structure, while a residence hall offers many opportunities for growth, leadership and education. If we look at Maslow's hierarchy of needs, the five levels include physical, safety, social, self esteem and finally self actualization with the lower levels requiring satisfaction before another level may be reached. A dorm would simply try to fulfill only the first two needs, physical and safety. Residence halls, on the other hand, go beyond these first two needs by offering social opportunities, leadership opportunities and many others which allow students to search for self actualization.

The residence life area has over fifty staff members and even more student leaders involved in hall government, the Residence Hall Association, and other areas of residence life. These staff members and leaders do more than attempt to satisfy the physical and safety needs of residence. By referring to the residence halls as "dorms" these staff members and leaders are basically given no credit for the hard work and long hours they invest in the residence life program.

Although it may seem only a matter of word choice, to those of us who spend hours a day trying to develop resident students to their fullest potential, we feel somewhat degraded. Please keep this word choice in mind when referring to the Residence Halls in future articles and in general conversations around campus.

Sincerely,
Sheila L. Walker
President, Residence Hall Association

Define "Embarrassing"

Dear Editor,

I am writing to disagree with an editorial you had in your paper, the way the disagreeing should be done, within the hall. I'd like to speak on the term you used to describe the good Senator Jesse Helms in an editorial.

"Embarrassing" in my opinion is not the word that should be used to describe a gentleman who has been sent to Washington to represent the majority of good people of North Carolina for the past 18 years and the next six years. He speaks his mind, which you do not agree with and you label him as embarrassing. If you want to talk about embarrassing, look at our other senator, Terry Sanford.

Have you ever seen them wake up Jesse Helms in the middle of a senate meeting to vote? No. Terry Sanford? Yes.

College Makes Opportunities To Change

...for some, success in the future depends on dealing with some of the issues that we bring with us.

New beginnings excite me! Each August, for me, is an opportunity for meeting new people, working on new ideas and trying to do old activities better. For freshmen, this is the beginning of a whole new era. For upperclassmen, it is a chance to increase your effectiveness in any area of your student life you choose to work on. Beginnings are fraught with potential and with possibilities.

BUT, there's a real issue that impacts all the potential and possibilities inherent in new beginnings. For many, experiences in our past contaminate the attitudes and energy we bring to this new year. You do not come here with a blank mind. For one thing, you are the repository of values that come from other people. You may have been taught what you ought to be when you grow up, what it means to be successful, what kind of people you ought not associate with, and so on. Men and women are often raised with biased concepts about the other sex and many religious people are raised with very limited perspectives about the nature of God and the nature of grace. This result, that you may have never examined before and which may control your attitudes towards other people, may determine your choices about the way you live your life.

Even more unfortunate, many of you who come here are damaged. Some of this stuff that you have had to deal with makes me feel very sad. Some of you have lost loved ones in tragic accidents. Some have had to deal with the divorce of parents. Others come here already with full-blown problems relating to drugs and or alcohol. Others, for no particular reason, simply don't come with a lot of self esteem or a self confidence. There is a whole group of you who are gay and have grown up in a homophobic culture. The bottom line is that for many people, life has not been easy, and whatever the struggle has been, it may still well exist and impact your effectiveness at UNCW. I mention this stuff, because I want you to realize that you have a choice to make. You can choose to do nothing different than before and go through the educational process here at UNCW and graduate as relatively the same person you were when you came here. The other choice involves your becoming intentionally aware of what there is in your past that may be contaminating your present beginnings at UNCW. Awareness is the key to change. A self taking charge of your life is highly possible at UNCW. The resources available to you at cost, already included in your student fees are incredible. If your confidence is low, if you are the adult child of an alcoholic, if you want to struggle to discover your own unique belief system, you can do that here. If you want to change your whole style of studying because of a commitment toward academic success, you can do that here. You can change. I promise you; you can change. And for some, success in the future depends on dealing with some of the issues that we bring with us to the present out of our past.

The first step is awareness. No one but you can identify what issues may be hampering your determination to succeed here, but if you can name an issue, you can reach out and find the resources that will help you attend to that need. Change is never easy but, creating a satisfactory and successful experience is pretty much up to you and I am convinced that this struggle to make positive changes is worth the effort and time.

'The Black Perspective' with Pamela F. Wall Some Introductions Are In Order

I will do my best in giving you the best accurate information that I can.

I am not an English major. I have a little desire to write, not because I am good at it, but because I believe I have something to say.

I am something of an idealist (and a math major) so, I expect things to behave in nice little packages. I do not claim to be as poetic as Phyllis Wheatley though I have been known to bust a rhyme from time to time. I am not as imaginative as Langston Hughes though I have let the old imagination run wild. I do not claim to be as "raw" and intense as Eddie Murphy or Toni Morrison though this article and those to follow may say some pretty shocking things.

There are some things I will not write about. Some subjects are so touchy and controversial, that I simply do not see the point. I will not touch sexual issues even though it seems blacks and homosexuals are getting the majority of the bad press about co-tracting AIDS. I will not touch religion even though we blacks seem to be forsaking the faith of our fathers and have forgotten that those old Sunday services are what got us through very hard times. And God knows, I will not touch abortion even though a black girl (or another minority) who becomes pregnant will usually carry the child full term.

I will do my best in giving you the best accurate information that I can. I will not commit the ultimate crime of insulting my readers. I assume I write to intelligent and competent individuals appreciative of direct and blunt opinions but who can occasionally read between the lines. Speaking of opinions, even though I will back up pertinent information with facts, this article will be my opinion, the writer, and not the gospel truth. This author is not a self-appointed spokesperson for the African descendants here and elsewhere.

Since this is an opinion article, I would not be terribly upset if someone wrote a letter saying what I write is complete bunk. I may be narrow-minded in thinking my views are correct, but I am broadminded enough to realize someone may beg to differ. I also solicit ideas from others who have worthwhile topics and would like them addressed in some fashion.

Why am I telling you about myself, putting some of my philosophy on the line to be inspected by those who read this paper? Why do I care about setting forth ground rules and taking the time in saying this article is my opinion and not set in stone? I guess I want to make a good first and lasting impression - like the kind you may get in an introduction. So, I suppose an introduction would be in order - UNCW Campus meet newcomer Black Perspective, Black Perspective meet UNCW Campus.

I think this is going to be a beautiful relationship.

Phillip Loughlin Let's Take A Little Walk

I took a walk the other day. I didn't have to walk. It would have been just as easy to hop in the truck and drive around. Or I could have pulled out the old ten-speed and motivated through pedal power. Both alternatives would have carried me faster, farther, and with far less effort. But I walked instead. Besides, I had nowhere to be and no specific time to be there.

Somebody might ask me, "If you had nowhere to be, why were you walking anyway?" That question reflects a lot more about our culture than the inquirer would probably realize.

Why walk? I could take the standard accepted route and say I do it for my health. Actually, that is a pretty good answer in an obtuse way. I don't walk because I want to lower my cholesterol level or burn calories. Those aren't the health reasons that are important to me. What's the point anyway, if I'm going to get home and replenish my system with a big steak, cooked rare, and a potato smothered in sour cream, with sauteed onions and peppers in wine sauce, and a salad with real bacon chips and doulosd liberally with bleu cheese dressing (Oops! a brief, fantastic digression?)

I walk for a different kind of health. It makes me feel good. I like the way my body kind of finds a rhythm after the first mile or two. It's something like what distance runners say they feel. Once I hit that point, I feel like I could go on for hours.

Years ago, I found just how far I could walk before it stopped being a pleasure. I lived in Southport, a small town about twenty five miles from here. For some reason or other, officials at the Department of Motor Vehicles decided they did not want me driving on their highways, so they politely revoked my driver's license. I had to hitchhike to get to Wilmington where my friends lived. Anyone who has ever had to hitchhike knows that even on the best days, you cover a lot of ground walking.

Often, if I lost track of time, I would find myself hitchhiking home on highway 133 after dark. If you have never been on highway 133, cruise out there some dark night, when the clouds devour the moon and the only light comes from phosphorous in the swamps. First, think about whether or not you would stop to pick up a hitch-hiker there at night. Then turn off your headlights (stop the car first) and imagine walking there alone. At any rate, it is between fifteen and twenty miles from the Leland end of 133 to the CP&L plant at Southport, and many nights I found myself covering that entire distance on foot. It quit being pleasurable about a quarter of the way (more or less depending on the darkness of the night) to the CP&L plant.

But that was walking out of necessity, and I was talking about walking for pleasure, for my health. Something about walking appeals to me. I don't know for sure what it is. Maybe it's the fact that walkers aren't restricted by roadways, like cars or bikes might be. Most people don't mind too much if you walk across their yard. Those who do mind have fences. Walking doesn't do much damage to property, save for a few picked flowers or bent branches.

I like to walk in the woods when I am to go places where bicycles and cars just can't go. There isn't much woodland left around my home, but I am familiar with what there is. Many times I have walked up on some children's "secret place" or a "fortress" tucked away in the fastness of a suburban woodlot. The nostalgia these things bring back of my own childhood is strong and palpable. You could never get this passing by at forty miles per hour.

It is getting harder and harder to find "real" woods to get away to, but I still know a few places. During hunting season, I often "hunt" for miles during the slow part of the day. I've never shot anything during these hunts, but I get to see a lot. I see all kinds of small creatures, squirrels, rabbits, birds, and even the occasional fox. Seeing them at home, and undisturbed is a far better experience than a blurred glimpse out of a car window. I find places and sights that those hunters who follow the hounds around in four-wheel drives never get to see (and for the most part, I don't think they really miss it. It's easy to imagine that the meadow at the end of a deer trail has never seen the track of a human foot.

Walking in the woods gives me a chance to find things. I had quite a collection of bones and colorful feathers at one time; until a germophobic mother found them while I was out. I also enjoy stopping to examine tracks or animal signs, and see what I can figure out about the creatures that made them. The woods are full of puzzles. Only by walking can these puzzles be solved or even discovered. This is something I think more people should experience.

Most people today don't get much opportunity to walk in the woods though. It doesn't matter. A walk among the downtown shops can provide just as much of a diversion. It is certain to be far more stimulating than speeding through in a car. It's nice to be able to peek in the windows of shops, and pop in anytime something appeals to you. For the adventurous, I suggest exploring side streets and alleys (keeping in mind that there are some areas where this is an unsafe practice and that there is a difference between adventurous and stupid). I love to watch people, and wonder about them. If you do that driving a car, you're going to have a close encounter with somebody else's bumper—something else you won't have to worry about if you are to walk.

We live in a culture that seems to disdain walking. Anywhere most people want to go, they build a road there, including the woods. I recently learned that North Carolina has more miles of paved road than any other state except California. In my rambles near my home, I have found that what was once dense woods has become a maze of nascent roads.

Cars are no longer the luxury items they once were either. It is becoming a rarity to find a married couple where both partners don't have a car. Getting a driver's license was once the status symbol among high school kids. Now those kids want a car of their own along with that license—and many of them get one.

What I am driving at, I guess, is not that everyone park their cars and walk to work. It really doesn't matter all that much to me if you want to hop in your car and scoot across the street to see a friend. But before you ask me why I walk with that "Oh, one of those guys" look on your face, try it. Phillip Loughlin is a weekly columnist with The Seahawk.

The administration, however, would expand loan programs for middle-class students. The Stafford loan limit would go to $3,500 for first- and second-year students and to $5,000 for third-, fourth- and fifth-year students. Graduate students could get up to $7,500 annually.

Also, the limit for Supplemental Loans for Students would increase to $6,000 for undergraduates and $10,000 for graduates.

The administration plan would create $500 achievement scholarships for Pell grant recipients and it would expand outreach programs to low-income communities.

Dong said she believes that many proposals favorable to students will make it into the bill.

Charles B. Saunders, a senior vice president with the American Council on Education, said most lawmakers were looking for ways to help middle-class families afford college without taking out too many loans.

"Where the punch comes is that the administration only favors grants for the neediest," Saunders said.

Workshops To Discuss Divorce

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor in Chief

The parents of almost one in four UNCW students are divorced. These students may show any of some common reactions to their parents' divorce. After the initial shock, they may experience anger, sadness, and an inability to develop a meaningful relationship with both parents.

College students also have to worry about financial support, housing, and even things as simple as where to go home for Christmas.

"It is a disorienting and disrupting experience," said Dr.

Vivian Rogers of the UNCW Student Development Center.

Rogers said that divorce around the time that children go to college is particularly disruptive, because children already need substantial support from parents. "That's the time you hope the center is going to hold," she said.

In order to help students who are dealing with these problems, Rogers, along with Dr. Eleanor Maxwell, professor of sociology, and Josh Lea, a UNCW student, has put together a series of workshops for UNCW students.

The series, called "When Your Parents Break Up", will be held on September 23, 25, 30, and October 2 in the quiet lounge of the University Union. To register, call the Student Development Center at 395-3746.

Lea said that students can attend any or all of the dates. "It's intended for students to come to all of them, but they can come to as many as possible," he said.

In addition to receiving written materials, participants can talk or listen in group discussion. Films on the subject will also be shown, Rogers said.

Rogers said the workshop should let children of divorced parents know that "there is life after divorce."

My Brady Memories Have Been Tainted

Warning: This article may be inappropriate for sensitive Brady Bunch devotees.

They were singing. They were dancing. They were wearing really shiny clothes, and bell-bottoms. (Yuck!) It was the Brady Bunch Variety Show?

Greg, Marcia, Peter, Jan, Bobby, Cindy, Carol and Mike, they were all there. I had just one question. Well, okay, actually I had many questions, but the most prevailing one was, "How come I didn't know that they ever had a variety hour?"

Why didn't anyone ever tell me? How could a young impressionable child, so infatuated with this family, forget that they had another show? Had I forgotten? Or was it an evil plot devised by my family so they wouldn't have to sit through another hour of "Brady Hell". Well, now I know ... and they will pay.

I kept flipping through the channels to make sure I wasn't caught up in some mysterious television time warp.

Was it a deranged programmer's idea of a sick, twisted joke? Had I fallen into an infamous episode of The Twilight Zone? What kind of demented fate had drawn me to this channel?

Were the television gods making me repent for my mis-spent youth? Why were they toying with my hallowed Brady emotions? Oh, the humility of it all, ... for them and for me.

As much as I wanted to turn the channel after the first five minutes, I just couldn't do it. I forced myself, vowing to stop the tortuous viewing, but each time something inevitably drew me back. I was pervasively mesmerized.

Carol, aka Mrs. Mike Brady, started singing "Memories", while flash backs of past episodes ... simultaneously appeared on the screen.

It was all too much for me. Serious sacred memories were being tainted. Life-long crushes on Greg and Peter were being sequestered ... Marcia was being checked off my "Coolest Chicks Ever" list ...

I kept waiting for Alice, the sensible one of the lot, to show up and bring these people to their senses. When I saw her "shaking her booty" with the rest of the bunch, I knew all hope was lost. ... And then Donny and Marie showed up ... I blacked out after that.

I may sue for desecration of sacred childhood memories ... "Yeah ... Right".

More Video Releases To Help You Procrastinate

Misery. One of Stephen King's novels that actually holds out on film. Rob Reiner (When Harry Met Sally, Stand By Me) directs. Kathy Bates won an Oscar for her disturbing portrayal of an overzealous fan who "rescues" James Cagney, a successful "fluff" novelist. If only he had put on the snow tires.

LA Story. I think to really appreciate this movie you have had to live in Los Angeles. I don't think Steve Martin, director and writer, took this into account. Good for a couple of laughs.

Sleeping With The Enemy. This one could go down in history as the beginning of the end for Julia Roberts' career. The best line (there was only one and hardly worth waiting for) comes much too late to salvage the film.

The Russia House. Sean Connery and Michelle Pfeiffer in the pre-glasnost, pre-revolution U.S.S.R.. Haven't seen it. Let me know how it turns out.

Look Who's Talking, Too. The film that was supposed to keep John Travolta on top, (again!) failed miserably. The idea was really cute the first time, but it wears a bit too thin in this one. Perhaps Hollywood will get the message that sequels to EVERY mega-hit is not always a good idea.

Wait For Dead Again To Be Reincarnated On Video

BY ZACHARY BISACKY
Entertainment Writer

Usually when one mentions the word reincarnation, I find myself searching for the nearest escape route. It seems to be something you either believe in strongly or you refute unquestionably. I, being the latter of the two, found it difficult to enjoy the movie Dead Again.

Dead Again is actor and director Kenneth Branagh's (Henry V) romantic detective story in which he, and co-star Emma Thompson, play dual roles in two different time periods: the Forties and the present.

When the film shifts to the past, we see Branagh portray a German composer who is executed for murdering his wife, Margaret (Thompson).

In the present, Branagh plays a private eye named Mike Church who is hired to find the true identity of an amnesiac (also played by Thompson) who recalls only the life of Margaret.

In effort to regain her memory, Church brings the amnesiac (whom he calls Grace) to hypnotist Franklyn Madison (played by Derek Jacobi) and through this hypnotism Grace is able to manifest the terrifying events of her past life.

Here the narrative dips from the present to the past, allowing the cast to realistically transport you to either of the two periods. The clothes and makeup from the Forties look superb, and Belfast-born Branagh mimics the American accent so well one might assume he was a native of the Mid-West. The pale blue and soft white shots that depict the past also give the viewer an added sense of authenticity.

Unfortunately, however, these high points of the film don't override the numerous shortcomings.

The movie becomes too cluttered with irrelevant incidents and inexplicable camos. One of which is made by in inept Robin Williams; The intrigue and suspense that Branagh tries to achieve with intricacy in cast and events only detract from the film's theme.

Also, what prevents this movie from being exciting, and even a little frightening, is its predictability. Once you view a scene from the past you can expect it to occur in the future. Most would regard this as a hyperbolic display of reincarnation, unless of course, you thought Flatliners was a substantive depiction of life after death.

Branagh blows the usually subtle hints of this equivocal topic to proportions the size of a Bayliner®, and by doing so, destroys any realistic credibility the film might of had.

Although it's not specifically stated, this film couldn't be anything but a spoof on the notion of having a past life. All of the scenes, like aforementioned, are filled with explicable absurdity. And the conclusion produces even more of an anti-climatic feeling, augmented by a second-rate, overly dramatic, love scene: indeed, a perfect opportunity to yawn.

To truly enjoy Dead Again you must be able to remove all your analytical rational, purchase a lot of Jr. Mints®, and, most importantly, have a sense of humor.

MTV Awards Given Out

BY RAMONA HUPP
The Fluff Meister

MTV tried something new with this year's award show: They let the audience take the front rows and made the exec's sit in the back. Two words describe the effect: total chaos.

Those who were allowed in the front, distracted presenters, made it difficult for winners to come to the stage and annoy the hell out of the camera people ... and me.

And that wasn't the only thing getting on my nerves. Arsenio Hall, who hosted the show, couldn't decide if he wanted to stay or go. I think that "special award" they gave him in the last half of the show was a bribe so he wouldn't walk out.

The show did excel in its effort to offer an extremely diverse group of live performances, from EMF, to Don Henley (who didn't carry on last year's tradition of singing with his fly open), to Van Halen and C+C Music Factory, and more.

Guns n' Roses did a great cover of "Live And Let Die" via satellite from London. And get this kids, Axl was wearing a kilt! Gee, Paul, do you think the trend will catch on?

But it was Prince, the original Madonna, who broke new (censor) ground. I don't even remember the song because I was so busy watching the orgy (literally) of people on stage. And then, all attention was quickly diverted to Prince's bare cheeks, and I'm not talking about the ones on his face.

Music ... You've got to love it. It's the gift that keeps on giving. It's there for you when you want it. It is also capable of satisfying whatever mood you're in, and if you're in the mood for some alternatively gratifying music that will leave you yearning for more ... then you need to tune in to WLOZ.

For the few of you who may not know what WLOZ is, I will tell you one time and one time only. So listen up. WLOZ is UNCW's own campus radio station. The station's office is located upstairs in the University Union (Room 211).

You can tune in on your stereo on 90.9 cable FM. Yeah, there's the catch. You have to hook your stereo to cable. But it's no big deal. I swear. It's really simple and totally worth the effort. Call the cable company at 763-4638 and tell them you want cable hooked up to your stereo, so you can get MTV in stereo. (They seem to think MTV is more important than WLOZ, go figure.) There will be a $10 hook up fee, plus a $1.75 per month in "musical devotion" fees. That's really not much when you think of all the great tunes you'll get to hear during your eternity at UNCW. What a great deal, right? Right! I thought you'd see it my way.

WLOZ is going to have an exciting year and we want the students to be a part of it. Feel free to come to the station and pick up the latest issue of New Route magazine or ask about some of our musical giveaways. [Did she say free stuff?] And if you're interested in becoming one of us ... a DJ, that is, then by all means troll up to our musical utopia and talk to us about it.

Those in charge this year are: Aimee Lanier, General Manager; Kelly Holsten, Engineer; Danny Ling, Music Director; Rev. Kermit Gurganis, Program Director; Christy Carr, Promotions Director.

"Quote Of The Week"

"Do we live in a time when notions of the collective good are so dominant that the individual spirit is disregarded? I think we do, in a lot of senses. History says that we didn't always, and the reason that you had your Ford and Edisons was because there was a time when we were secure enough as a people to be able to encourage the individual spirit. I think that idea has been terribly wounded."

Did You Care?

Did You Know?

News Flash! Elvis Sighted

From College Press Service

Elvis parachutes into a New Hampshire greyhound park. But wait! He's also been sighted at a Texas grocery store. Or maybe he's running a fishing camp in Montana.

Dr. Robert Cole, a professor of pop culture, has heard them all, or at least a good many stories in which the late, great rock 'n' roll singer played a dominant role. Alive, of course.

According to Cole, Elvis has been spotted at Burger Kings, shopping malls and grocery stores everywhere from Montana to Texas to Hinsdale, N.H. And he should know — he keeps track of Elvis sightings as part of his research.

Cole, an expert in American history and music of the 1960s, said he thinks the Elvis sightings stem from a lack of inspiration in modern-day American society from leaders, musicians and other powerful figures. Elvis died in 1977.

"Energy, imagination, boyish enthusiasm for life. That's just some of what Elvis represents. People are attempting to recover that in some way," says Cole, a professor at Rippen College in Wisconsin. "We can all see Elvis in our mind's eye, but only the crazies see him in a shopping mall and talk to him."

Cole says he finds Elvis fun to study and says the King is "significant to American culture."

"I think primarily it's this latent desire for what Elvis represents in his music and his lifestyle," Cole said.

Cole says calls the Elvis is Alive phenomenon is just "wish fulfillment." He says that until society can find another figure as inspirational as Elvis, sightings and books about the sightings will continue.

"We are so much on the edge of this type of thing," Cole says. "The breakup of communism might inspire it. ... Until then, we're left with visions of Elvis."

Take, for instance, the recent contest sponsored by the Hinsdale Greyhound Park in New Hampshire, which offered $1 million if Elvis (wherever he is) showed up Labor Day weekend to sing on a stage set up in the infield.

As it turned out, Elvis was a no-show.

But, Labor Day wasn't a total bust at the dog track — an Elvis impersonator did parachute into the park, was arrested, insisted on singing as police dragged him away, took the stage and was booed off for his awful voice and hips that just didn't quite gyrate like the King's.

"We hired this (public relations) agency to promote our Labor Day races," says Chip Ainsworth, park public relations director. "One of the guys thought of offering Elvis a million dollars when he was reading the tabloid covers in the grocery store."

Being of sound mind and body — and knowing that Elvis is dead — these men hired the impersonator to drop by for some excitement.

Weeks before E-day, after the promotion already gained attention in Hinsworth, a small New England town of about 1,500, a woman reported seeing Elvis in a local supermarket. Ainsworth read about the woman in the local newspaper, which ran the story on the front page. The next day the park held a press conference featuring the woman who talked freely about her experience. More media took notice.

Then one man tried to turn his vision of Elvis into profit.

"We had this guy from Georgia call us saying he was Elvis' representative and asked us to give him the money," Ainsworth says. It didn't work.

Student Dead

From College Press Service

TALLAHASSEE, Fla.—Florida A&M University officials ordered increased security patrols on campus and urged students living in off-campus housing to take extra precautions following the slaying of an 18-year-old coed.

Carmela A. Face was found dead Sept. 2 in her apartment about a mile from campus, police said. University President Frederick Humphries described the industrial engineering major from Fort Lauderdale as "a brilliant student with unlimited potential."

"There are no words that can express our sense of loss," Humphries said.

Police are treating the case as a homicide, although they have refused to release details about the slaying. Police spokesman Phil Kircocfe said there were no signs of forced entry.

According to school officials, Ms. Face, a sophomore with a 3.6 grade point average, had sought dormitory housing, but was turned down because of a shortage of available rooms. She rented the off-campus apartment in August.

Humphries said he ordered the extra security patrols to raise students' consciousness about their personal safety.

"We do not want to cause undue alarm, but the safety of our students is always our paramount concern," he said.

He emphasized that the slaying was believed to be an isolated incident and not related in any way to the Gainesville murders.

SGA UPDATE

SPOTLIGHTS

Student Grievance Board

Committee Head: Joe Mitchell

Contact: Anyone interested in becoming involved with this committee should contact Joe Mitchell in the SGA office.

The Student Grievance Board was designed to look at the concerns of UNC-W's students. In the past the SGB has looked at various student grievances, such as parking, and are currently looking at possible solutions to them. The Student Grievance Board meets on Wednesdays at 5:30 outside the old University Union's information center.

Goal: To look at the concerns of UNC-W's students.

Committee Members: Sheila Walker, Mike McDonald, Cindy Moore, Christy Gunnell, Michelle Mitcham, Sean Williams

note:

Each week in The Seahawk, the Student Government buys one page to update the student body on all Student Government sponsored activities and events. The Public Affairs Committee is responsible for this publication and would like to take advantage of this space to recognize one member of the S.G.A. each week as well as one S.G.A. sponsored committee or organization.

Sean Williams, Spring Rep-At-Large

Sean has served on the SGA for the past two years as a member of the Constitution Committee. As an active member of the Student Government, he strives to make himself and other students aware of activities on campus and works to make a difference in the successes of these activities. From his experience with the Student Government, Sean feels he has gained a better understanding of the UNC-W SGA as well as that of Student Government Associations throughout the university system.

Sean feels that the SGA constitution needs the most attention of any other entity involved within SGA.

"The SGA constitutions need to be organized and a uniform set of rules established and followed."

The Executive Board

The President - Curtis Wilson
The Vice-President - Kelli Shafer
The Attorney General - Lisa Royal Student Services Coordinator - Joe Mitchell
Treasurer - Kathy Starnes
Public Information Officer - Line Dempsey

Freshman Class President

Brad Heath "I am seeking the office of freshman class president because I have always been one who wants to get involved and make a difference in the issues that affect myself and those around me. I want to be in a position to make sure that the SGA is representing the student body to its fullest capabilities. A good student government needs to work hard to attain the goals set for meeting the student body's needs."

Robbie Wise "I am seeking the office of Freshman Class President because I feel UNC-W freshman need to have a more active voice on campus. Freshman should be more informed of campus-wide activities as soon as they arrive in the fall. I also have many ideas concerning orientation, campus dining hours, parking, and Welcome Week."

Roger Hyman "I am seeking the position of President. I feel that as a former Student Body President at my high school, I am well equipped to handle this position. I know how hard work, and diligent dedication are three essential tools needed to do this task. I possess all of these, along with new insight into ventures that could put this freshman class on the map as outstanding movers and shakers."

Cissie Sprinkle "I am seeking the position of Freshman Class President because I feel I am qualified for the position of President. I know my class can benefit from the qualities I have. I will do my best to represent them well!"

Freshman Class Vice President

Christine Policastro "To further develop my leadership abilities and to represent the freshman class."

Pamela Ward

Lisa Beckwith "I am seeking the position of Freshman Class Vice-President. I feel that I am well qualified for this position. Also, I know I can voice my peers in a way that they will respond to the SGA versus."

(Gretchen) Amanda Leese "I am seeking the office of Freshman Class Vice President. I feel that I have the experience in leadership that it takes to successfully fill this position and be a strong leader as well as a great right hand man and complement to the class President."

Freshman Class Senator

Todd Wolf "I am doing this because I want to get my 'feet wet' with the SGA. I do not feel I have the knowledge of the campus to take on any greater than this at this moment in time."

Jason W. Strickland

Brad Keeler "To get my 'feet wet' and get the feel for SGA without having a lot of responsibility on my shoulders."

Krista Habecker "I would very much like to represent the freshman class as their Senator. In high school I was active in student government and I want to continue that. I like to be involved in what's going on around on campus."

These people are running for Fall Representative At Large

Kris Leggett

David Hinson "I am seeking fall rep. at large. The reason I am seeking this position is basically because I have always wanted to be involved in SGA, but really did not know where to begin. Fall rep. at large would be a position that would not be too overwhelming for me to handle right away, and would also allow me to gain valuable insight into how SGA really works."

Jeffrey S. Holeman

Laura Doepp "I feel I can well represent the student body. I am concerned about the future of this fast growing institution, and I feel I can make a positive impact on new and old concerns that come before the Senate."

Nina Pino

Vanessa Nye

Holly Price "I am running for one of the seven representative seats for the fall of 1991. I am already involved on campus in various activities and I would like to be more a part of the way UNC-W is run."

Mike Saulis "I am seeking the position for Fall Rep. at Large because I want to get involved with the SGA this year. I feel I can do a good job because of my positive attitude and my hard work philosophy. I also want to be more involved with the school to get a better understanding of how it works."

Max Westland "I have past experience in representing my peers at my previous college and in high school. With seven positions open, there is also an obvious need for student representation. As an individual concerned with the needs and interests of my peers, I feel a representative-at-large is more easily accessible than a higher level officer of the students."

Vern Granger "I want to continue the work that I did during my first term."

Christy Sanders "To help preserve and better the reputation of the SGA and to serve the need of all students as best as I can."

Victor L. Brown

Kristian Pulliam "I am seeking to be a representative at large for the Sophomore class. My reason for seeking this position is that I feel confident that I can represent my class well. I love to meet and work with people. I believe I would be a good addition to SGA at UNC-W."

note: The above direct quotes were taken from survey sheets that were completed by the candidates, and appear here exactly as written on the surveys. Some of the candidates did not fill out sheets, and this explains why nothing was written for them. Responses to this survey are those of individual candidates and are not necessarily those of SGA.

EMERGE Offers Leadership

BY JEFF HOLEMAN
News Writer

Applications for Emerge, a leadership enhancement program are now being accepted at the Leadership Center in the University Union through September 20. Co-facilitators Cathy Birmingham, assistant director of the University Union for leadership development, and Pat Leonard, dean of students, will guide 30 students through the program each semester.

According to Birmingham, the Emerge program will be held in two sessions, one each semester. The first session will be open to freshmen only. It will focus on personal development and learning to work well with others. The second session is open to all students and will focus on specific leadership skills and styles, as well as working with groups. Participants in each session will attend weekly meetings throughout the semester.

Birmingham said, "Students who've been through Emerge in the past three years have a higher grade point average and retention rate. They're more likely to stay at UNCW."

Emerge is not the only program offered through the Leadership Center. The Leadership Center offers seventeen different programs. Some of these programs include the Discover Outdoor Center, the Leadership Transcript, Black Student Leadership Network, Volunteer Program and Leadership, Education and Development (LEAD) Consultants.

The Discover Center is offering new programs along with the services offered in the past. Birmingham and Mandy Hartman, office manager for the Leadership Center, said that for the next three Saturdays, there will be car trips offered exclusively for freshmen. The trips are designed for all freshmen. One does not have to know about the outdoors in order to attend.

The Leadership Transcript is also new to the Leadership Center. The transcript is a way to document your extra-curricular activities while in college. Birmingham added that the transcript is proven to help people get jobs. The transcripts can be picked up and updated in the Leadership Center.

The Black Student Leadership Network, Volunteer Program, and LEAD Consultants are also preparing for another busy year. BSLN had 50 students at its first meeting. BSLN strives to make UNCW a better environment for blacks. The Volunteer Program has recruited over 200 students to help in after school programs at area elementary schools. The LEAD Consultants are planning programs and workshops for the year. Hartman, a LEAD consultant, stated that the group presents workshops on leadership skills and can do a program to fit the group's needs.

For more information on any of the programs offered by the Leadership Center contact the Leadership Center, located at the University Union in room 212.

POTSDAM, N.Y. — It was a spectacular night at the Star Lake Fish Camp. Hors d'oeuvres were served from canoes. Guests dined on a feast of Adirondack trout or roast filet mignon and finished with maple mousse.

It was a blue-ribbon meal, in a "Great Camp" setting, that won Potsdam College's dining service first prize in a nationwide contest held by the National Association of College University Food Services. The dinner won rave reviews from officials invited from State University of New York institutions this past spring.

George Arnold, Potsdam's dining services manager, prepared a scrapbook that described the dinner, and a local story teller and basketmaker entertained guests with tales of Adirondack history.

CARBONDALE, Ill.—Birth order doesn't necessarily affect destiny—at least where the presidency is concerned, say two political scientists.

"While at first glance, it looks like we have more first-born and only children becoming president, the data just don't support it. Nor does birth order influence their behavior once they become president," says Albert Somit, a professor at Southern Illinois University at Carbondale.

Somit and his partner, Steyvn A. Peterson, a social sciences professor at Alfred University, were curious if first-born and only children had an edge for the U.S. presidency, and if they performed differently than younger siblings when in office.

Though much literature links birth order and presidents, the professors found there is no relationship. However, their study of the Supreme Court has turned up a curious exception. Many justices were or are first-born.

Explosives Found On College Campus

EDISON, N.J. — Middlesex County College is one school that hopes never to take the Big Bang theory literally.

Since the end of June, the Army Corps of Engineers has unearthed explosives on the school campus, built on land where an arsenal used to be located. School officials caution, however, that the munitions have not proven to be dangerous.

For years, the corps looked sporadically for old explosives buried on more than 1,000 acres that belonged to the Raritan Arsenal, used during World Wars I and II, according to college spokeswoman Joanne Stern. Middlesex occupies about 200 acres of the land that used to house the arsenal.

"They've been searching for buried munitions since (the arsenal) left," Stern says. "It's sort of a myth around here."

But this summer a former employee of the arsenal located a site and the corps returned, Stern said.

So far, the corps has unearthed more than 50,000 fuse caps — small detonating devices with little potential for danger. The caps were found at a site near the school president's house and the college's business building.

"The president hasn't moved," Stern said. "We have been very precautionary and concerned. There is nothing hazardous or dangerous to our students or faculty."

The corps is continuing its search and may stay on campus another six or eight weeks, Stern said.

The county college was built on the Raritan land in 1964 and has about 11,000 students.

Looking For The "Write" Word Choice

Hmmn, let me think.

We need a catchy slogan. We want to attract the right clientele (people), for this highly important position. He or she has to be honest, obedient, trustworthy, and clear. Whoops..... that's the Boy Scouts' creed.

How about, "Be a part of the few, the proud, the... ah shoot, that's the bloody marine theme.

Okay, I've got it. "Be, all that you can booooooeeeeeeeee, army, right?

Well, I don't know. What kind of manipulation of the English language can I conjure up on my computer that would woo, yes, woo you to join the ranks of Woodward, Bernstein, and Fowler in the rewarding career of print journalism.

Do you want people to listen to what you have to say? Do you want to travel the globe? Do you want to meet famous stars?

Then, apply at your local Walt Disney World's small theme park. I hear they are looking for more Monorail and Small World ride attendants.

However, if you desire to spend innumerable hours at a computer screen typing stories, dealing with screaming irrational department editors, or having people slam doors in your face, after you've told them you are a reporter, then writing for The Seahawk may be your calling in life.

Actually, to be perfectly honest, people don't slam doors in journalists' faces. They just refuse to open them in the first place.

But hey, that's a minor detail. Once you have seen your byline at the top of an article, you'll think the same words all great reporters do, "God, I hope I spelled everybody's name right!"

The same story year end year out

Every year I come up to The Seahawk newspaper office in hopes of finding new writers for the sports page. Every year I'm disappointed when only a few souls volunteer.

This year I need CPR.

When our editor-in-chief looked over the applications to write at The Seahawk, more than one went like this:

"I would like to improve my skills and talents as a writer. I would like the opportunity to do this at the newspaper. I would be willing to write on anything but sports!!!!"

"Horror," I thought. What could be the cause of this lack of interest in athletics?

I mean who could turn down interviewing sweaty athletes in their jockey briefs, enduring irate coaches' outbursts after losses and being hunted down by 220 lbs. players who want to discuss your last column ridiculing their in-pit performance on the field.

Come to think of it, why am I here?

Sports: always something new to see

But seriously speaking, sports writing isn't that bad. It is unique in fact. It is the only medium where you can analyze, evaluate, and predict the outcome of an event and still be surprised with the final result.

Maybe the slogan should read, "Sports, where it stops, nobody....," 'no everybody knows that phrase.

You see, sports are constantly changing. Athletes are getting faster, smarter, and stronger. Sports technology and medicine has given these warriors more weapons to combine with their talents to punish the opponents in their sports.

"Sports, the final frontier?" Nah, who would use a phrase as dippy as that?

Sports also showcases the gambit of human emotions better than any other medium. Unknowns rise from the pack and elites fall from the ranks of the invincible.

Just when you think you've found every way to win a game or lose an event, somebody comes up with a new one.

Sports is life, the world, the universe.... sorry, I got carried away.

Finally, the right words come to me

What I'm trying to say in this column is that the arena of sporting events has a lot to offer new writers.

A sports journalist's job simply is to bring the color, emotion, and excitement to life.

It is work, but somehow after interviews, typing, retyping, and editing, there is a sense of pride when you look at your name at the top of the article. I get that tingly feeling of excitement after every line.

Soooooo....., if you think you can write or had a dream that you came by 205 E in the old Student Union and filled out an application, you can talk to me if you want.

Just look for a guy pulling his hair out, sweating profusely, and typing out his letter of resignation.

Hey, I've got the slogan. "Journalism, to understand it, is to live it."

Perfect. Any talent.

Seahawks Shut Out Twice

BY DAVID BARNHARDT
Seahawk Sportswriter

UNCW opened its '91-92 soccer season with a pair of home losses to Colonial Athletic Association foes, James Madison and George Mason, this weekend on Brooks Field.

The Seahawks (0-2 overall, 0-2 CAA) dropped a defensive battle 1-0 to James Madison on Saturday and fell 5-0 to a powerful and quick George Mason (3-0, 3-0) squad on Sunday.

The JMU affair was a physical one. Referee Jim Carpenter whistled the Seahawks for 26 fouls and the Dukes for 19, as officials kept a firm grip on both the game tempo and emotions.

The game-winning and lone goal of the game was scored by Ivan Sampson. Sampson, who was named CAA player of the week Monday, scored as he slid behind Seahawk defenders and pounded in a corner kick by Scott Davis with at the 20:05 mark of the first half.

The Dukes applied pressure to the UNCW goal all afternoon. Goalie Tom Redmond was forced to come up with several spectacular saves to keep the Seahawks within striking distance.

"Tom made some great saves for us out there," senior midfielder Peter Clay said.

UNCW found themselves on the defense for most of the contest. However, when scoring opportunities arose, the Seahawks forwards were unable to find the Dukes' goal. UNCW had one last chance to send the game into an overtime period, possessing a corner kick with seven seconds remaining in regulation. The Seahawks were unable to get a shot off as JMU defenders cleared the ball away from the goal mouth.

The loss was the third time in three years the Dukes have defeated UNCW by a 1-0 count. The Seahawks have beaten the Dukes just once in six tries. Their lone victory was in 1987.

UNCW was outgunned Sunday in their match against the regionally second-ranked George Mason Patriots. George Mason is positioned behind Virginia in the Mid-Atlantic region grouping.

The Patriots' speedy and explosive offense attacked and penetrated the Seahawk defense often, netting two goals in the first half and three in the second for a 5-0 victory. Each Patriot goal was scored by a different player.

Overall, UNCW was outshot 22 to 8 and had only three corner kick opportunities to GMU's six in the contest.

GMU striker, Greg Franke led the Patriots' attack. The forward netted a goal and two assists.

The Patriots set the tone quickly, scoring early on a goal by Brad Young, just nine and half minutes into the first half. Striker Tamir Linhart scored 12 minutes later with an assist from Corey Harlan as the Patriots ran out to a 2-0 halftime advantage.

GMU showed no signs of slowing down in the second half, extended their lead to 3-0 ten minutes into the second half on a solo breakthrough by forward John Kelly. Kelly's goal seem to deflate the Seahawks' morale in mounting a comeback.

"We played well in the second half," Clay said. "but after they scored that third goal so quickly, we got down on ourselves."

"We never, in my four years here, have been much of a comeback team. If we had scored a goal to cut the lead to 2-1, the outcome and our reaction would have been much different."

Goals by Martin Brilantine and Greg Franke rounded out the Patriot scoring.

The Seahawks' take on Methodist, Thursday in a non-conference home contest on Brooks Field. UNCW holds a 5-1-1 in the series, but the Monarchs upset the Seahawks 2-1 last season in Fayetteville.

Game time is 4 p.m.

Both a George Mason and UNCW soccer player battle for control of a loose ball in a weekend conference game on Brooks Field. The Seahawks (0-2) lost to the Patriots 5-0.

UNCW spikers will have a "tall" order to fill when the Seahawks square off against the Duke Blue Devils 7 p.m. tonight in a non-conference volleyball match in Hanover Hall.

The Blue Devils, making their first appearance at UNCW, have an average player height of 5'9". Duke also has three players who are six feet tall or higher. UNCW, in comparison has an average height of 5'6" per player.

"Duke, I think will be a bigger challenge to our team than our match against Carolina two weeks ago," head coach Kathy McDaniel said. "The Blue Devils are almost robotic in their approach to the game."

"They know where each other are on the floor at all times. However, because of their height, they are also very slow moving to the open spaces on the court. If we can use our quickness to our advantage, we can throw them off their game."

The Seahawks will have to rely on fast sets, dinks shots, and strong serves to combat a powerful Duke line-up that features several California players.

Last season, UNCW took a 6-1 mark into a round robin tournament in Durham, N.C. The result was three consecutive defeats as the Seahawks fell to George Washington, Northwestern, and the host, Blue Devils (4-15, 12-15, and 15-8) in three straight games.

"After we played Duke last year," McDaniel said, "we switched the way we played defense. We're more aggressive now, putting our sure-handed players on the back row."

"To be successful out there we have to move them out of their normal play set patterns."

UNCW is a young team. The Seahawks starting line-up consists of only three seniors. Almost half of the squad is composed of freshmen and sophomores with one year or less of collegiate playing experience. Yet despite this glaring disadvantage, UNCW appears unshaken at facing the Blue Devils head-on.

"People who were intimidated by this game last year are gone," junior setter Sheldon Plentovich said. "Duke is tall, but very slow on the court. I think we can take them if we play well."

Freshman outside hitter Josie Youngblood agreed, "Both Duke and UNC are known for their quality program. The game will be so intense that I want to jump out on the court and play."

UNCW will try to draw on the same intensity and power they exhibited in a Sept. 4 destruction of Coastal Carolina.

The Seahawks blitzed the Chanticleers in three straight games, 15-4, 16-14, and 15-4. UNCW used a strong service game and consistent blocking at the net to stamp out any Coastal Carolina's momentum.

Senior Kim Cavanaugh's 11 blocks and Plentovich's 28 assists helped pace UNCW. Cavanaugh leads the team in solo (10) and tandem blocks (20). The Binghamton, N.Y. native also holds the team high for kills with 27 stiffs.

"We were out for blood after losing to UNC-Asheville and Carolina," Plentovich said.

The Seahawks will try to push their winning streak to two games tonight against the Blue Devils.

UNCW Hosts Meet

A top-quality field is expected at UNCW's 7th annual Seahawk Cross Country Invitational this Saturday, Sept. 14, at Brooks Field.

Eight collegiate teams are scheduled to compete in the races, which begins early Saturday morning. The men start at 8 a.m. and run five miles, with the women following at 8:45 a.m., covering 3.1 miles. High school varsity and junior varsity teams will take off after the collegiate competitors.

Those competing include UNC-Wilmington, Campbell, Charleston Southern, Coastal Carolina, East Carolina, N.C. State, Richmond, South Carolina, and Winthrop.

Head coach Bill Cason, who enters his fourth season at the helm of the program, directed the Seahawks to first place finishes in both the men's and women's segments one year ago. He says UNCW will have a tough time defending its titles.

"This is a smaller group than usual, but we have a good mix of teams up front," Cason said. "There will be plenty of competition for everybody."

Of the eight teams, Cason says N.C. State and South Carolina should provide the biggest test for the Seahawks. The Wolfpack is ranked in the pre-season Top 20.

11 veteran runners return for the Seahawks, forming a solid nucleus of experience.

The men's team is led by junior Sam Bobbitt and seniors Larry Jackson and Shawn Britton. Bobbitt earned All-Conference honors last year, while Jackson and Britton suffered through tough seasons.

Britton, the first Seahawk ever to capture All-Conference honors, ran with an illness for most of the fall season. The trekker was healthy for the spring track year and captured the conference 3,000 meter steeplechase event at Williamsburg, Va.

Jackson missed the entire 1990 season with a stress fracture. He finished 12th overall in the conference meet two years ago.

The final two experienced male runners for Cason are junior Jered Haag and sophomore Kristian Agnew. Both are expected to improve this season. Freshmen Tim Cox and Danny Miller are the two rookies for the Seahawks.

Cox was an All-State performer in both cross-country and track and field in his senior year of high school, clocking a 9:14 in the two mile run.

The women's team can't afford any injuries, with only six runners to its squad.

Senior Kris Scott will once again lead the Lady Trekkers. Scott was the first UNCW female to earn All-Conference honors in cross country last year.

Adding constant pressure to Scott's grip on the number one running position will be junior Amy Jackson. Jackson missed the last three meets of the '90-91 season with a foot injury.

Complementing the top two runners are sophomores Lakonia Walker and Jill Peeples. Both runners are expected to move up in the conference ranking this season.

"Lakonia and Jill are coming off good summers of training," Cason said.

Freshmen Michelle Melton and Heather Helton are the two newcomers to the team.

Enrollment Stats In Face Of UNCW Is Changing

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor In Chief

UNCW officials released final enrollment figures for the fall of this year. Total enrollment climbed to 8,097 students.

The number of graduate students increased this year to 383, up from 336 in the fall of 1990.

The sophomore class logged the most enrollment with 1,698 students. The second largest was the senior class with 1,658 students. Junior class enrollment is 1,478; new freshman enrollment is 1,554; and old freshmen (those with not enough hours to reach the sophomore level) number 1,050.

A record number of students transferred this year to UNCW from other institutions including technical institutes and community colleges. Of the 921 transfer students this year, 494 came from technical or community institutes.

University officials also noted an increase in students in the "special/unclassified" category. These students are "students taking personal enrichment courses as well as those who already have degrees but are taking courses to meet job requirements or to prepare for a career change," an official from the office of University Relations said.

Dean of the college of arts and sciences Carolyn Simmons said that these non-traditional students increase demand for night classes.

The university has scheduled almost twice as many night classes this year as were offered in the fall of 1990; 88 courses are offered this year compared to 45 last fall. The evening courses offered include at least two courses from each basic study category per semester. "With this increase in evening offerings, a student now will be able to complete all basic study course requirements at UNCW by attending course in the evening," Simmons said.

The increase in night courses also helps the university better utilize limited classroom space, she said.

Black Enrollment Declines

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor In Chief

The percentage of black students attending UNCW fell this year. The decrease was reported by the university when final enrollment figures were released Sept. 9.

While the large increase in this year's enrollment included a record number of black students on campus, black enrollment is lagging behind enrollment of non-blacks.

The university reported an enrollment of 462 black students this year which is 18 students more than last year. However, the percentage of black students on campus decreased from 6.4 percent last year to 5.7 percent this year.

University officials also announced figures on minority hiring of faculty. Of the 30 new faculty hired for this year, four were black.

Bob Fry, special assistant to the chancellor for planning and director of institutional research, said that the hirings were "an indication of continued active minority recruiting at UNCW."

Minority recruiting at UNCW includes an advantage given to minority applicants, said Carolyn Simmons, dean of the school of arts and sciences. Among a pool of qualified applicants, she said, minorities "would likely have an edge," she said.

Same Weekend As Riverfest Family Weekend Coming Oct. 4

BY BETH CAPPS
News Writer

Family Weekend 1991 will kick off its activities beginning October 4 and lasting through October 6. This event will give the parents of UNCW's students a chance to meet the friends and instructors of their children. There are several events lined up for Family Weekend, including a wine and cheese reception on Friday and a University welcome by Dr. William Bryan, Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs, and a picnic lunch on Saturday.

During this reception, parents can meet the faculty and administration. As well as a wine and cheese reception, parents will be treated to a picnic lunch. Saturday afternoon is open for family activities to be planned. The Parents Advisory Council is open to all parents interested in attending as well.

Carol King from University Advancement is hoping for a large turnout of parents. "We had eight hundred parents last year and we're hoping for even more this year. Students are asked to encourage their parents to come. It will be a good time."

Family Weekend will also run into Riverfest, a traditional festival held every October by the Hilton on the waterfront. Riverfest will offer a variety of arts and crafts and entertainers, including cloggers, bands, and live broadcasting by local radio stations. This festival is known to draw thousands of people to the downtown Wilmington area each year.

Other area interests for families, students, and faculty to look into are the Battleship North Carolina located on the Cape Fear River across from Wilmington's waterfront, the North Carolina Aquarium at Fort Fisher, which guards the entrance to the Cape Fear River, and Wrightsville Beach, located approximately five miles from UNCW.

Any families interested in Family Weekend are asked to make reservations as soon as possible since hotel space will be limited. Several hotels in Wilmington will be offering discount rates for this festive weekend, including Howard Johnson's on Market Street, Fairfield Inn on South College Road, Holiday Inn on Market Street, Ramada Inn on Market Street, and Comfort Inn Executive Center on South College Road. In the Wrightsville Beach area, Holiday Inn on North Laina Avenue and Blockade Runner on Waynick Boulevard will also be offering discount rates. The deadline for reservations is September 20 and the deadline for registration for Family Weekend is September 30.

This year's Family Weekend Chairs are Bill and Diana Getzelman. They feel the weekend is an event that shouldn't be missed. "This is a great opportunity for parents to meet their student's friends and instructors and to experience UNCW firsthand," The Getzelmans, members of the Parents Advisory Council have "enjoyed working with the university administration and faculty. We have benefited from our involvement with the school over the last few years." The Getzelmans hope other parents can enjoy an experience similar to theirs.

Election Results Announced

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

SGA Elections were held Wednesday. Positions being filled were freshman class officers, and fall representative at large.

Roger Hyman won the freshman class president office.

Other candidates for the office were: Brad Heath, Cissie Sprinkle and Robbie Wise. Hyman, said he wants to "put this freshmen class on the map with the outstanding movers and shakers."

SGA President Curtis Wilson said, "When Roger found out he won, he was turning cartwheels."

Hyman's duties as president include initiation of a class project and calling class meetings. With the class vice president and senators, Hyman is charged with representing the interests of his class in the SGA senate.

Christine Policastro won freshman class vice president.

Other candidates for freshman class vice president were: Pamela Ward, Lisa Beckwith and Amanda Leese. Policastro says she is looking forward to developing her leadership abilities and representing her class. Her duties are to assist Hyman and represent the views of her class.

Todd Wolf and Krista Haecker were elected to freshman class senator positions.

Unsuccessful freshman senator candidates were Jason Strickland and Brad Keefer. As senators, they are charged with representing the views and interests of their class.

Fall representatives-at-large to the Senate are: Kris Leggett, Nina Pino, Vanessa Nye, Holly Price, Christy Sanders, Victor L. Brown and Kristian Pulliam. The spring representative-at-large elected was Ashley Wallace.

Price, who was elected as a fall rep-at-large, said "Oh my god! I can't believe I won! I'm really excited about working with SGA."

I'm looking forward to it."

Voter turnout was 580 — higher than last year's figure of approximately 465. Shasta McAllister, election board chairman, has been office for two weeks. She said, "The election wasn't bad because a lot of the SGA members helped. I just wish all the candidates could have won."

Wilson said, "I want all the candidates to get involved, whether in SGA or other organizations."

Wilson added that he was pleased with the elections. "I think the elections went well. I was impressed with the zeal displayed by all the candidates, particularly the freshmen."

Both McAllister and Wilson said the results are "accurate." Li-Shing Wang was appointed by Dr. William Bryan to witness the tabulations.

Obscenity Question Miami Hotline Under Fire

From College Press Service

MADISON, Wis. — The man responsible for 2 Live Crew's troubles has started another anti-obscenity crusade, this time against the University of Wisconsin and a Miami teen hotline.

Jack Thompson, head of the Coral Gables, Fla., group Parents Opposed to the Propaganda in Schools, claims that audio information tapes distributed by the university promote homosexuality, drug use and masturbation and do not comply with a Florida obscenity statute.

"We've had our own opinions rendered by a legal staff and they tell us we are not out of compliance with the law," said George McKinney, associate executive director of The Switchboard of Miami, the non-profit crisis prevention service that uses the tapes for its teen hotline.

"This man is after one tape — the recording on homosexuality — because he's highly homophobic," McKinney said. "What can you do about that? It's a matter of personal opinion."

'What we are promoting is responsible behavior...'

The tapes, distributed by the University of Wisconsin at Madison, are part of a service the school's University Outreach program offers.

The 875 tapes provide information about topics that range from health care and diagnosis to social issues such as homosexuality, abortion, drug abuse and masturbation. Each tape plays for three to five minutes, and the subjects are determined by the people who request them.

The tapes are distributed nationally under the name Health-Line in more than 25 states to about 70 health and social service organizations, secondary school systems and colleges and universities.

"The tapes are developed and written by our faculty and staff and are periodically reviewed by faculty and staff for revisions," said program director Ann Whitaker.

Thompson, unavailable for comment, earlier told the Associated Press that the tapes "mentally molest minors ... behind parents' backs."

The University of Wisconsin's response to Thompson's threat of a suit was short: "We are cooperating with the Florida Bar (Association's) investigation and are not commenting any further on it," said Chuck Stathas, general counsel for the University of Wisconsin System.

McKinney said over 600,000 teen-agers have used the tapes via the hotline since the hotline emerged in January 1990.

"(Thompson) is distorting this to make it sound like we are promoting smut on the telephone," McKinney said. "What we are promoting is responsible behavior."

Last year, Thompson convinced a federal judge that rap group 2 Live Crew's album "As Nasty As They Wanna Be" was legally obscene.

Volborth Wins Fellowship

From the Office of University Relations

Lavonne Adams Volborth, second year graduate student in English at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington, has been awarded the Sylvia and B.D. Schwartz Graduate Fellowship for academic year 1991-92.

A resident of Holly Ridge, Volborth is the mother of three children - Micah, Miranda, and Veronica, all students at Dixon Middle School. She is the daughter of Thomas and Vivian Hankins of Raleigh.

According to Dr. Eric Bolen dean of the UNCW Graduate School, Volborth was the unanimous selection from a pool of students nominated by the deans of the three academic units where graduate degrees are awarded.

After transferring to UNCW from Old Dominion University for her final year of undergraduate work, Volborth graduated from UNCW with an exceptionally high grade point average. She entered the Master of Arts in English program at UNCW in the fall of 1990. After completing her master's, she plans to enroll in doctoral studies to prepare for a career in higher education.

Nomination letters submitted on her behalf by professors in the English Department cited Volborth's "exceptionally fine mind" and her skills as an excellent scholar and researcher. She was described as "a gifted, imaginative writer and a sensitive, probing reader. Her intellectual strength and enthusiasm, as well as her discipline and hard work, combine to make her the kind of graduate student instructors dream of having."

Her major field of study is creative writing with a minor emphasis on contemporary American Fiction. In addition to her graduate studies, Volborth is a teaching assistant responsible for teaching two sections of freshman composition. Volborth is the fifth recipient of the Schwartz Fellowship, established in 1987 to provide a grant equal to resident tuition and fees for the full academic year. This is the first graduate fellowship to be established at UNC Wilmington.

B.D. and Sylvia Schwartz are long-time supporters of UNC Wilmington. He was a member of the Wilmington College Board of Trustees from 1958 to 1969, where he was a leader in the movement to locate the campus to its present College Road site. He was a member of the UNCW Board of Trustees from 1981-1988. Sylvia Schwartz was one of the organizers of the Friends of Wilmington College in the early 1960s, a group initially formed to expand the holdings of Randall Library necessary for accreditation by the Southern Association. A residence hall named to honor B.D. Schwartz's service to the institution was dedicated in October 1989.

Playboy Opens College Fiction Contest

News From Playboy Magazine

The October issue of Playboy magazine (on sale September 3rd) features "Crewcut," a short story by Ellen Umansky, winner of the 1991 Playboy College Fiction Contest. Twenty-one-year-old Umansky, who graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in May, received $3,000 for her first place entry, a story which probes a sobering topic -- the effect of her mother's desertion on an alienated 15-year-old.

A second prize of $500 in the 1991 contest was awarded to Bernardine Connelly, a 27-year-old graduate student at the University of Virginia for her entry "Properties."

Third prize winners are graduate students Mathew Chacko, 20, of the University of Alabama, for "Hema, My Hema" and Lee Durkee, 29, of the University of Arkansas, for "Roads out of Lost Soldiers."

"We're very committed to this contest; it's the only one of its kind and a great opportunity for young talent," noted Alice Turner, fiction editor of Playboy. "Our winners move on to even greater achievements; I like to think Playboy gives them the drive and confidence to succeed."

Contest rules have been distributed to literary students through college newspapers, and the creative writing departments of some 1,400 colleges and universities nationwide. The rule can also be found in the October issue of Playboy magazine (p.174).

Entries are now being accepted for Playboy's 1992 College Fiction Contest, open to all registered undergraduate and graduate students. The writing competition is judged by the editors of Playboy magazine. The deadline for receiving entries is January 1, 1992.

Phi Kappa Phi Evaluation Begins

The UNCW Chapter of Phi Kappa Phi, the national honor society for distinguished students in all academic fields, has begun its evaluation of student records, for consideration of election to the society. The by-laws allow a student to be considered for membership with a 3.75 grade point average for juniors with 74 hours or more completed, a 3.68 GPA for seniors with 89 to 105 hours, and a 3.60 GPA for seniors with more than 105 hours completed.

Elections to the society are made each semester, after analysis of the University's academic records to determine eligible outstanding students. Final decision is made by the student and faculty members of the chapter. A formal initiation ceremony will be held in the spring, shortly before graduation, with the date to be announced.

Opening Football Game The UNCW Seahawk football team will take on UNC on Sunday at 2:00 p.m. at the gym.

UNCW Hosts Soviet Forum

BY BONNIE CLARK
News Writer

UNCW hosted a forum on the present crisis facing the Soviet Union. The forum, held Sunday, October 7 was entitled "The Soviet Crisis: Rebirth of a Nation". It was moderated by Chancellor James R. Leutner. The guest speakers included Dr. Susan McCaffray, Russian and Soviet history professor, Dr. Steven Rosefield, an expert on Soviet economics, and Representative H. Martin Lancaster, of the third congressional district.

The audience was given three different perspectives on the crisis. McCaffray provided the historical background information on how the Soviet Union came into existence, and Gorbachev's thinking on Nationalism. The economic point of view was supplied by Rosefield. Congressman Lancaster provided the Congressional side of the issue.

McCaffray said the Soviet Union was facing two historical crises, the further continuation and existence of the union itself.

'The Soviet Union Is In the midst of a monstrous depression. . .'

Gorbachev, who was raised as a Communist, does not believe that the great Nationalism that swelled in the Republics since the coup still exists. McCaffray said that Gorbachev, like Lenin probably sees "Nationalism" as a mirage. She also said that the Union's breakup, because of Nationalism, was, totally unexpected to Gorbachev.

Rosefield compared the Soviet Union of 1983 and the Soviet Union of 1991. Dr. Rosefield said, "The Soviet Union is in the midst of a monstrous depression greater than that faced by the world in the 1930's. The economy is almost totally collapsed because of Mikhail Gorbachev's policies on economic reconstruction, free speech, democratization of society and New thinking. 'The problem began', Dr. Rosefield said, 'when Gorbachev lacked a coherent strategy to allow for an orderly transition to a social market economy.' Rosefield foresees the four greatest problems facing the economy of the Soviet Union to be: 1) the continued collective ownerships of land and property 2) the institutionalized control of prices on goods 3) the addition of the Soviet Union people to the concept of socialism in the market place, and 4) the fear by the people of a free market economy's ups and downs.

Congressman Lancaster, a Democrat, criticized President Bush's Cautiousness. Lancaster feels that Gorbachev is no longer in charge after returning from the coup attempt. He said, "Gorbachev has lost all credibility and he will be unable to regain it." Lancaster also believes more attention should be shown to the president of the Baltic States since they will be in power in the future. Lancaster further criticized President Bush for waiting to recognize the Baltic States independence. He also sees Bush as trying to protect Gorbachev and refusing to give due credit to the Baltics and other former Republicans for forcing independence.

Bicycle Safety Is Important

BY LAURA KEETER
News Writer

To enjoy right-of way at crosswalks and on sidewalks on campus, one must be a pedestrian. Lieutenant Charles Willis of Campus Police said that cyclists are being "allowed to use pedestrian sidewalks because there are no campus-wide bike paths yet."

Crime Prevention Officer Hunter Davis said that UNCW is a pedestrian campus and cyclists need to move around the pedestrians. Davis said the only difficulty in maneuvering a bike is when the cyclists are going too fast or riding a passenger on the handlebars of the bicycle. "Cyclists need to be aware of the pedestrians," said Willis.

Davis said the biggest problem on the sidewalks is not when the cyclists are coming toward pedestrians but from behind. "There aren't too many people who are going to take a bicycle head-on," Davis said. Davis added that cyclists need to be aware of the pedestrians who may not hear them coming. At crosswalks, cars have the right-of-way - not bicycles. Cyclists should yield to traffic unless they dismount their bikes. Willis said if a cyclist and car collide at a crosswalk, the car owner can bring charges against the cyclist.

"People at the crosswalks are looking for a pedestrian. Generally, people are not looking way up the sidewalk for something that's coming," Davis said. He said what usually happens is the car makes it into the crosswalk area and the bike runs into its side.

Rules for cyclists to obey are listed in the UNCW Traffic and Parking Regulations brochure. Davis said that last year two bicycles ran into the back of cars that had slowed down for a stop sign. "Most likely, the cyclists were pedaling with their head down instead of looking in front of them." Willis added that cyclists should be careful when riding down Riegel Road, where angled parking makes it hard for cars backing out to see a cyclist. Although cars and pedestrians do have the right-of-way, Davis said pedestrians and drivers shouldn't take advantage of it. All parties need to be aware of each other because there will always be people who are unfamiliar with the crosswalk situation.

Sophomore Tyra Greer, who walks to class, said "If the walkers were considerate in getting out of the way of the bikers or if the bikers were nice and polite and said 'excuse me' then we wouldn't have a problem. But I think maybe the walkers are a little hostile to the bikers and the bikers are just dominant over the walkers."

Maria Lawrence, a sophomore, said she "wouldn't mind moving for the cyclists if I just knew which way to move. Bikers need to say 'to the right' or something."

Chief Billy Dawson said there will be a Safety Committee meeting to discuss the problem of bicycle safety. Willis said that the university hopes to have bike paths, but until then, "a little courtesy goes a long way."

Cameron To Speak On D-Day

From UNCW News

Daniel D. Cameron Jr., Wilmington civic and business leader and UNCW benefactor, will speak on "Personal Observations of D-Day Plus Three" at 8 p.m., Thursday, Sept. 26 in Cameron Hall Auditorium on the campus of UNCW.

The free lecture is sponsored by the University of North Carolina at Wilmington Museum of World Cultures. The public is invited to attend.

A graduate of the Virginia Military Institute class of 1942.

Cameron served four years in the United States Army from 1942-46. Within a year of his graduation from VMI at age 20, Cameron made captain in May 1943 when he was 21 years old.

In his talk, he will discuss his personal experiences as an anti-aircraft artillery officer participating in the invasion of Europe. He ultimately attained the rank of major.

A partner in the Cameron Company, Cameron is former president of Atlantic Telecasting Corporation that owned WECT-TV 6.

He is a director of United Carolina Bancshares and Carolina Power & Light Company and former chairman of Atlantic Pepsi-Cola Bottling Company.

In addition to business activities, Cameron has a long history of community involvement and support for the University of North Carolina at Wilmington. His wife, Elizabeth Henderson Cameron, is a former UNCW trustee. At present, he is a member of the board of directors of the Community Boys Club and a member of the Board of Visitors at Virginia Military Institute.

IF YOU'RE INTO DOPE, YOU MIGHT AS WELL SMOKE THIS.

There's one sure way to see your future go up in smoke. Do drugs. Last year alone, America's businesses lost more than $60 billion to drugs. So this year, most of the Fortune 500 will be administering drug tests. If you fail the test, you're out of a job. The message is simple. Doing drugs could blow your whole education.

WE'RE PUTTING DRUGS OUT OF BUSINESS.

UNCW Offers Study Abroad Program

From UNCW News

Want to see the world and pursue your degree at the same time? A dozen students will have that opportunity this spring as participants in UNCW's Study-Aboard Program in Great Britain.

Sophomores, juniors, and seniors of all majors with at least a 2.5 GPA are eligible to participate in the program. Students will spend this spring semester at the University of Wales in Swansea. Accompanying the group will be English Professor Richard Veit and his wife, Anita Veit of the Department of Sociology and Anthropology.

"This is a once-in-a-lifetime experience," said Richard Veit, the program's on-site director. "I studied in Europe when I was a sophomore, and it was easily my most valuable and exciting experience as a student. I'd urge everyone to take advantage of this opportunity, which they may not get again."

Ample opportunity for travel is an important feature of the program.

Students in the program earn 15 credit hours. Courses are interdisciplinary and are related to the experience of being in Britain. Besides study in the classroom, participants have the option either to work in an internship tied to their major or to create an individual writing project.

"Being in Britain while studying British history and literature adds a whole new dimension," said Veit. "Traveling to London, Canterbury, or Stratford makes study about those places come alive."

Ample opportunity for travel is an important feature of the program. Spring break at Swansea is 33 days long. Last year, students used that time to visit families of friends they made among British students or to travel throughout the British Isles and Europe.

This is the second year of the program. UNCW is placing an increasing emphasis on international studies, Veit said. "The world is now an interrelated community. Foreign travel is an important part of an education that will prepare students for life beyond the 1990's. Students studying abroad find that it broadens their outlook and changes their lives."

Swansea is located on the south coast of Wales. It is considered one of the most beautiful areas of Britain, with outstanding beaches, cliffs, and coves. Swansea is situated conveniently, with London being less than three hours distant by train.

Cost for the semester program is $4250, which is considerably less than most study-abroad programs at other universities.

An informational meeting about the program will be held Thursday afternoon, September 26, at 3:30 p.m., in room 106 of the Social and Behavioral Sciences Building. All interested students are invited to attend.

Americans Deserve Some Help

The U.S. Congress is working up a second bill right now to extend unemployment benefits for 10 weeks. George Bush has already said that he will veto the bill just as he vetoed the last one.

The bill would cost around six billion dollars. In order for that money to be allocated, a "budget emergency" must be declared. This is because of the anti-deficit laws that were passed.

Bush apparently doesn't consider the plight of Americans out of work, with no unemployment benefits, important enough to warrant the emergency. Bush has authorized the "budget emergency" only twice.

The emergency was declared once to allow the S&L bailout. That probably is an emergency insofar as the cost of the bailout is pushing $1 trillion.

The other emergency was declared to allow aid to the Kurds in Iraq.

That's right—the Kurds can benefit from American tax money but the Americans who paid the taxes in the first place can't touch it.

Once again George Bush is showing his fetish for foreign policy at the expense of the American public.

It seems so ironic that the unemployed in America can't get government help when the government is at least partially responsible for their plight.

Certainly, the nightmarish cost of the S&L bailout is encumbering the economy and subsequently throwing people out of work. And while the heads of the S&L's (like Neil Bush) are mostly responsible for the debt, the government gets some blame for miserable (though not unusual) regulation of the industry.

And what about the Kurds? They do deserve some help from the government that encouraged them to resist the rule of Saddam Hussein.

But certainly as desperate and crucial as these "emergencies" is the condition of unemployed Americans whose benefits have run out. They deserve the aid that Congress wants them to have. Bush should sign the bill.

Drug War Simply Isn't Working

BY PHILLIP LOUGHLIN
Contributing Writer

Spurred by a column in a local newspaper, my friend and I were talking about the "Drug War" the other day. I was telling him how I didn't think it was working—how I felt like the money could be better used elsewhere. "Legalization," I suggested, "is what we need. Legalization and regulation."

I'll never forget the look he shot me. There was a curious mingling of surprise and disdain—sort of like what you might get from a girlfriend who caught you with another woman. What struck me most though, was the element of terror in his stare. He stepped away from me, as if I had just broken out in vipers. Then, he just looked at me. A part of me wondered what I had said that was so terrible. Another part reveled in the fact that I had finally stricken him dumb.

The silence was not long-lived though. He shook his head sadly. "Of all the people," he muttered, "I never thought I'd hear such blasphemy from you."

"Blasphemy?" I wondered.

"I have to agree with what you said," he went on. "The drug war is not doing as well as it should. I mean, sure the image that used to accompany drugs is a little tarnished. Druggies aren't generally considered funny or far out anymore. Young kids are once again parroting the propaganda induced 'Drugs are dumb,' like they did in the early seventies (Of course, their first step when they reach pubescence will be to reject everything they were taught during those years). My friends, who still smoke pot say it's getting hard to find a consistent source."

"With all this, I still don't think we're getting our 180 million dollars per year (or whatever that figure was) worth. Somehow, I don't think that ad with the guy frying eggs has changed too many people's minds. Neither have those insidious little notes we see in the screens of some video games. I have even seen deodorizing pads in urinals, emblazoned with the message, 'Say No to Drugs.'"

I laughed. I had seen those too.

There's too much money to be made and too little risk.

"Hey!" my friend said sharply. "There's nothing funny about it. They're spending all this money to promote a multi-media advertising crusade and it's literally ending up in the toilet! Part of that is my tax dollars!"

I started to explain to him that he was hitting my very point. "Most of the money for this 'drug war' is being mis-spent," I said. "They are fighting a problem that runs much deeper than getting eight-year old kids to just say 'No.' They are fighting, among other things, the human condition, well-fed in America, that demands instant gratification. You can't just tell it to go away."

He interrupted. "You can get rid of the drugs though. We can win the drug war."

"How?" I challenged, "when the DEA, Coast Guard, and Customs crack down, the CIA pays and protects drug runners in other places. Our own government is in conflict with itself. Not to mention crooked DEA, Coast Guard, Customs, and other officials who cycle the drugs right back onto the street for their own profit? There's too much money to be made and too little risk."

My friend nodded. "Yeah, that's a problem. 'Zero tolerance' doesn't mean diddle right now. But see, I have some ideas of my own on how to solve the problem."

I kind of thought he might. "You see," he began, "they're calling this thing a war but, at best, it's a sparring match. There's a little jab here, a feint there—every once in a while they'll throw a real mean hook. Let's call Panama a sweet right cross."

"It's time to re-evaluate our strategy here. War is not winning threats and half-hearted assaults. We need to go for it! Redirect some of that advertising money. Reassign priorities. We need to mount major actions against drug producing areas. If the governments resist, overthrow them."

"The way I see it, there are only limited drug producing areas. Let's knock them out of business. First, we'll spread a military net, more or less, across the Gulf of Mexico. Mobilize as much military force as we need. They're not doing anything right now, and they're battle hardened."

"In one slow march, we'll roll down across Mexico, Central America, and South America. The troops will use those high-tech satellites and reconnaissance planes to locate and eradicate drug fields and manufacturers. Everything pertaining to drugs and manufacturing will be razed. Resistance should be expected, but it can be quickly isolated and crushed. Use of force should be liberal."

"I realize that some of the smaller countries, such as Peru, depend on drug money to support their economies. That should not be allowed to obstruct our mission though. We have to eliminate the drugs. They'll just have to get back to the economies they had before drugs became such big business. Besides, the economic instability will offer us an excellent opportunity to install a government of our own choosing."

"When we finish with Central and South America, we will have eliminated most of the marijuana and cocaine supply. After placing a light but impenetrable blockade around the area, we can direct our attention to the far east. In a similar operation, we can knock out the supply of heroin and hashish. We can cruise through all of those little Communist countries with no real problem, because the Soviets are in such a turmoil right now, they won't be able to do much more than complain. We're already used to that."

"That should do it for foreign drug production. Then it will be time to turn our attention inward."

"First of all, we need to make some changes in our legal system. Any crime pertaining to drugs should be made capital. It seems that we are making strides in that direction already, but they are meeting opposition. Our government is strong enough to overcome that though. I personally prefer public execution, but that is not really pertinent—as long as the scam dies."

"We need to make it mandatory for all students in public schools or universities to take weekly drug tests. All members of the work force should likewise be tested. Anyone testing positive will be tried as a drug offender and subject to suitable penalties. These steps should lower demand for drugs noticeably."

"The inner city is a final trouble spot. I think we have approached this problem all wrong. We need to eliminate all those bleeding heart programs. Just flood the areas with drugs and withdraw law enforcement to form a cordon around the hot spots. Let the gangs and druggies kill themselves off."

"Actually, this has potential for commercial television. Instead of 10 second bites on the six o'clock news, we could have hours of urban violence broadcast into our homes. We could pick favorite gangs, and show our support with hats and t-shirts. The proceeds could be used to strengthen our team's arsenal."

"When one gang has wiped out all the others, move it to another city and let it compete with the leading gangs there. Bring the final survivors to L.A. and let them fight it out in a 'Game of Superpower'. Any individuals left over can then be bused down and executed, or placed in arenas to compete against other survivors as modern day gladiators. In the long run, this project is sure to make far more money than it costs."

"Thus, we will have ended the drug problem, drug abuse, and drug-related crime. As a pleasant side effect, we will have thinned the population a little and spread our imperialist holdings across much of the world."

My friend smiled broadly. "Well," he said, "there's my solution. Do you see any snags in my plan?"

When I left him, he was still laughing hysterically.

Take Some Horrible Advice

BY PHIL SMITH
Contributing Writer

Just when you thought it was over, just when you thought you had seen the last one; some demented, deviant, schizophrenic maniac comes out with yet another Class B Horror Flick. Yes, fellow Bambi-lovers, A Nightmare on Elm Street IV: Freddy Dies...Again hit the theaters this past weekend. It will more than likely gross millions of dollars and at the same time gross out millions of people. And as if this is not enough gore for one to take in, Child's Play II: Chucky Goes After Barbie, has also hit the theaters recently.

I don't even understand why people still go to the movie theaters anyway. It costs $11.00 just to get in the door (or $5.50 if you are fortunate enough not to have your girlfriend/boyfriend/gay lover along with you).

Then of course you may elect to invest in a small (so small that you can't even get your vehicle hand in the box and you have to turn it up like a drink and, of course, spill all three terms) box of popcorn, topped with a half gallon of 10W/40 motor oil.

This, along with an eight ounce cup of ice (including a few complimentary molecules of Pepsi) sets the stage for about five bucks. My personal theory is that these movie theaters are run by the same people who run the campus bookstore. Doesn't that make you go "hmmmmmm...?"

To make matters even worse, movies like these always come out on none other than...FRIDAY THE THIRTEENTH. All of the old "Jason" movies (I believe at star even outnumber Rocky and Star Trek) always come out on a Friday the thirteenth. This bit, of course, instilled in my generation of movie going youth an undeniable fear of disgruntled, machete wielding, masked, reincarnated (3 times) campers.

Aside from this, these movies have proven, yet again, that our society is so sickly perverted as to pay money just to see others sliced, diced, minced and mangled. Other societies do not behave this way. In China (I use a Chinese example knowing full well that I may be attacked by a disgruntled Asian-American) for instance, a good horror movie might be Godzilla Takes Peking. In Britain, Margaret Thatcher's Home Videos would be the worst horror an Englishman could bear.

So, in honor of these all-new-and-improved-blood-and-guts movies, as well as this past Friday the Thirteenth, I am introducing my Ten Things Not To Do In A Horror Flick.

1. Do not go to camp anywhere near a town called "Salem."
2. Do not open the door if blood is running out the bottom of it.
3. Do not, when being chased by the six-murderer, jump into the nearest Volkswagen; it WILL NOT start.
4. Do not go into a room for which there is no exit.
5. Do not, when walking through the woods, ignore the "...dun dun...ch ch..." you may hear; run like there is a propane torch on your rear. (See also: Rule 9)
6. Do not keep saying, "John is that you?" if John does not answer. If John's head was still connected to his body, he would answer.
7. Do not hide under the bed. This is not your mother that you are hiding from.
8. Do not think for a minute that you can "whip" the six-murderer. Six-murderers are by nature, very strong and not easily whipped.
9. Do not, while running from the six-murderer, fall down. This simply is not the best time to catch a cramp.
10. Do not, under any circumstances, go back into a house in which your friends have just been slaughtered and that the six-murderer is most likely hiding in.

Well friends, Friday the thirteenth is over and so is my story. Until next time...Keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

Address Questions To Find Truth

BY BOB HAYWOOD
Campus Minister

So much of our attention and energy gets focused on making it through the day. Right? I already see signs from people that the stress levels are rising as assignments are made and deadlines approach. There are just so many details to attend to, so many separate tasks to complete. And the more that stress increases, the more difficult it is to stand back and reflect on some of the larger issues of life.

And yet, we will miss a very important dimension in our college life if we don't spend some time reflecting on what this experience is all about, what is important and why we are here at all.

In a broader sense of the term, these are all spiritual issues and one of the dimensions of our education is to work on our personal spiritual well-being.

Spirituality is a person's search for meaning and values in life in the context of his relationship to Ultimate values or Truth or God.

To achieve a state of spiritual well-being is to recognize that there is a spiritual dimension to life and to be engaged in the questions that relate to that dimension of life.

Many who come here to UNCW are religious in that they have grown up as a member of some congregation or temple and participated in a religious system. But this may be the first time that you have taken the chance to begin to explore your own spirituality (according to the above definitions) as distinct from your past religious life or even a lack of religious life.

We are all people who operate out of a value system. The only question is, how in touch with our values and beliefs are we? It is almost inevitable that experiences we have here at the university, both personally and educationally, will challenge some of our held beliefs, and, if explored, will set us out on a journey of exploration to discover what it is that brings us a sense of meaning.

We are not, or do not have to be, raw living in the masses of life only out of instinct. We are graced with the gifts, spiritual gifts, that enable us to be intentional about how we use each day and all of our lives. You are setting for a distorted human experience if you do not begin to attend to the issues related to your spiritual well-being.

Who am I? How do I find deep joy? Is there a transcendent reality that can add poignancy to my life? Is there a way of life that is true and, if followed, will bring to me a sense of fulfillment? How can I care for the people outside of myself and for the world? These are some of the issues I would label "spiritual". And I would assure you that spiritual well-being is not a matter of having all of these questions answered, but in recognizing their importance and being in the process of dealing with them.

Will You Feel Better Once You've Seen The Doctor?

BY ZACHARY BISACKY
Entertainment Writer

Does anyone actually feel better when they see a doctor? Upon mere sight of getting a diseased feeling, I inevitably find myself comparing the person to a bottle of rubbing alcohol (although after treatment, if successful, this perception is inclined to change.) The film I saw most recently, The Doctor (still playing at College Road Cinema), attempts to personify these sterile images most of us have regarding those in the medical field. It almost succeeds.

Based on the non-fiction book by Ed Rosenbaum's, The Doctor, casts William Hurt as Jack Mackee, an arrogant San Francisco surgeon who is extremely removed and detached about his work - so much that he needs to listen to music while operating on his patients (fortunately, for the unconscious patients and slumbering film viewers, it's Jimmy Buffet). Even at home, he maintains a distant-space relationship with his wife (played by cinema's perpetual house wife Christine Lahti) and son (Charlie Korsmo), who speak to him once a week via car phone.

The muscle of the movie comes when Mackee acquires throat cancer and finds himself in a frightful role reversal where he becomes the patient. Expecting special treatment and sympathy from his fellow employees, he is only met with the same sterile coldness that patients of this large hospital (and occupants of UNCW dormitories) are. The insensitivity is remarkably displayed by an inundation of forms, tests, evasive prognosis and the hospital itself, which feels about as cozy as an IBM building.

Hurt gives the film the elevation it needs with his incredible engaging performance during Mackee's descent into hospital life. His dry sense of humor is entertaining, but it is his intense emotions that make one wish for natural death rather than experience such a woeiful place.

Unfortunately, this exciting role-reversal motif comes to a halt when director Randa Haines (Children of a Lesser God) and writer Robert Caswell lead us into a mellow drama that entails all the stodgy elements of an afternoon soap opera. When Mackee is incapable of revealing his emotions to his wife he turns to another cancer patient, June, played by a sentient Elizabeth Perkins. By reason of his newly developed compassion for the patients, he takes June dancing in the desert which only clears the way for a feeble sentimental conclusion.

As expected, Mackee becomes more sensitive in his profession and with his family as a result from cancer. Subsequently, he opposes his long-term partner's unethical medical views, played by a sprightly Mandy Patinkin, and makes his interns endure the same hospital life as he had.

In short, The Doctor is a film with strong a foundation but a weak narrative outgrowth. The premise of a surgeon's role reversal and the performance by William Hurt are definitely worth viewing. However, once again, it is the feel-good conclusion and the unlikely ending that prevent this film from being thoroughly enjoyable. ... And the music ... maybe you should stay home and read Rosenbaum's non-fiction version instead.

"Quote Of The Week"

"... Understanding each word of the dialog is a must for most European films. In American films, by contrast, dialogs spoken by actors are more a support of the visual narration ... [which] implies a style for more dynamic filmmaking, visually more active and with more concern for the rhythm and the visual effect."
Dimitri Balaichoff, on his study of why American films require less subtitles for foreign markets.

Film Group Announces Showings

Cinematique, a group organized to bring foreign, classic and art films to smaller areas, in association with College Road Cinema, has begun a film series in Wilmington.

The program will show eight films, three times a week: 1:30 p.m. on Sundays and 7:30 p.m. Mondays and Tuesdays. All shows will be $4. (Student discount tickets, available at the University Union's information booth, will NOT be accepted.)

Sept. 22-24: Spartacus
Oct. 6-8: Mister Johnson
Oct. 20-22: Reunion
Nov. 3-5: Drowning by Numbers
Nov. 17-18: Cyrano de Bergerac
Dec. 1-3: La femme Nikita
Dec. 15-17: Journey of Hope

DID YOU KNOW?

American made films such as Three Men & A Cradle, Down and Out in Beverly Hills, and Quick Change were all remakes of successful foreign films.

What Is That Thing Round Thing Called?

I have been deeply perplexed of late by the question of exactly how I should refer to those things that music is recorded on. (And who does Dave (MTV's 120 Minutes) Kendall's hair, but I only have so much space ... and patience.)

My bewilderment was heightened when I was recently berated because I used the word album in mixed company. (The mixed company being young and hip. I apparently wasn't.)

The conspiracy continued as a professor made reference to the fact that I will be able to tell my grandchildren all about those things called "records", since they will surely be obsolete by the next decade. (And this in no way should imply that I will have grandchildren by the next decade, ... pending miracles, of course.)

Album, disk, record, release, compact disc, cd ... Which one is a (somewhat) young and hip girl to choose?

Well, being a (somewhat) young, hip and smart girl, I immediately went for the old dictionary. Here's what it said: album n. - One or more 12-inch long-playing records in a slipcase. A recording of different musical pieces.

record n. - Something, as magnetic tape, on which sound or visual images have been recorded.

disk also disc n. - A round flat plate coated with a magnetic substance on which data may be stored.

Okay, so maybe I have an outdated dictionary. Maybe I'm outdated. I have yet to buy a CD player. I just have this feeling that when, and if, I ever break down and buy one, they will become obsolete three weeks later.

But that's not the only reason I have resisted the urge. In some absurd way, I would feel bringing home a CD would be a betrayal to my extensive record collection.

Not to mention the principal of the matter. The CD was not only invented for better clarity, but to make the music companies more money. It's no wonder I have shied away from using the word disc in my vocabulary.

The Rolling Stone magazine must feel the same confusion. They still use the word "record" in their charting and review sections, and yet, the words "albums" and "discs" are also found scattered throughout their pages.

If the word "record" is obsolete, will Record Bar have to change their cool logo? Will the dictionaries update their entries? And while we are on the subject, should we call it a tape, a cassette, or a cassette tape? ...

Perhaps I should just call up my good buddy Dave Kendall—the demi-god of alternative music, and the darn best interviewer in the biz. (Insert heavy sarcasm.) And while I've got him on the phone, I'll talk to him about the hair. I promise. 'Yeah...Right'

Come To WLOZ Night

BY SHANNON DAVIS
WLOZ Correspondent

Something new is going on happen at Jacob's Run this fall. The big rage will be WLOZ Night At Jacob's Run. It will take place Wednesday and/or a weekend night every week. This new attraction will tentatively begin in October and hopefully, last the whole year.

Danny Ling, music director at WLOZ, is in charge of booking the bands for this up-and-coming music extravaganza. "It's going to be run under the same format and concept of programming as the station. Whoever is semi-popular at the station, as well as some new promising bands, is who I'm trying to get to play at Jacob's Run," Ling said.

Some bands that are definitely coming are LOVE CHILD, MY DAD IS DEAD, PRISON SHAKE, and THE DWARVES.

LOVE CHILD, which consists of two girls and a guy, performs catchy and pop-ish personal songs. The New York-based band, of Homestead Records, sounds similar to the VELVET UNDERGROUND and PAVEMENT.

PRISON SHAKE will be opening up for MY DAD IS DEAD. They are from Cleveland, Ohio and are with Homestead and Scar Records. PRISON SHAKE has a dry, biting sense of humor with a "stop and groove-ish" feel to it.

MY DAD IS DEAD is a noisy hypnotically resigned band with quirky lyrics. They could be considered a hybrid of I AM CURTIS, the CHAMBERS BROTHERS and STEVE ALBANI. They sound like an early stage of JOY DIVISION and MISSION OF BURIAL.

Last, but not least, THE DWARVES, from San Francisco, are currently on Sub Pop records. This plain and simple punk rock band will be playing all their hits, from their Sub Pop debut, Blood, Guts and Other Delights.

There are some other bands Ling is working on, but he said they are in the top secret stage right now.

"This is not necessarily going to be background bar music. We are trying to bring innovative, dynamic and interesting bands to WLOZ Night," Ling said.

Well, this sounds like something to definitely look forward to. So keep your eyes and ears open for more information, and stay tuned to WLOZ.

SGA-UPDATE

SPOTLIGHTS

Judiciary Committee

Committee Head: Lyn Corney

Contact: Anyone interested in getting in contact with the Judiciary Committee may call the SGA office at 395-3553 or stop by University Union room 200.

The Judiciary Committee keeps records of all absences at senate and committee meetings and enforces the attendance policy at such meetings. The committee also investigates any alleged offences of SGA officers and determines punishments when deemed necessary.

GOAL:

The Judiciary Committee wants to remove the image that senators don't care about what goes on in SGA and would like to emphasize that senators are active participants in SGA.

COMMITTEE MEMBERS: Jeff Gurkin, Vanessa Nye, Vern Granger, Ziggy Nix, Christy Sanders, Sean Williams

Lisa Royal, Attorney General

Lisa has been an active member of the SGA since 1988. She has served on the Constitution Committee and as chairperson for ACE, the Association for Campus Entertainment. Lisa has been part of writing several SGA bylaws and has helped to maintain the rules of SGA elections.

Lisa feels that the SGA needs to work on making sure that students have a way to be heard and on insuring that their voice counts. She recognizes that major efforts such as SGA Update, the SGA logo contest, and Student Discount Cards, have been made this year to better inform students and get them involved on campus.

Lisa intends to continue with the Student Government next year but is unsure of the position she would like to hold.

note:

Each week in The Seahawk, the Student Government buys one page to update the student body on all Student Government sponsored activities and events. The Public Affairs Committee is responsible for this publication and would like to take advantage of this space to recognize one member of the S.G.A. each week as well as one S.G.A. sponsored committee or organization.

Points to Ponder...

SGA President Speaks

To be or not to be? Why is the sky blue? Where do babies come from? What is the meaning of life? Classic questions with classic answers. What questions should you as a college student be asking? What problems do you perceive with university life? Are you getting what you pay for? If not what can and should be done about it? Questions, questions everywhere and only you can answer them. It's about time for we, as students, to stand up and take an active, helpful, informed role in this university. Things will not change until we change them ourselves. In order to do this we must be informed and united. The great thing about information is that it is unlimited and that information also equals power. It is our right and privilege to use that power to make our lives better. If we don't we are cheating ourselves! Nobody likes a cheater.

Students Whip Out Credit Cards To Ease Debt Problems

BY AMY REYNOLDS
College Press Service

The student loan check arrives, but the money always seems to run out before books are bought and fees are paid.

No problem. Charge them. An outfit that's perfect for a weekend date is on sale, but it's still just out of spending range.

Charge it. The car breaks down. It needs a new gizmo.

Charge it. In the college world of the 1990s, students are equipped with more than mom's chocolate chip cookies and clean sheets when they arrive on campus. Most have discovered that they shouldn't leave home without a major credit card.

"We've found that students go on to be some of our best customers," said Gail Wasserman, American Express public affairs manager. "They perform no differently than our other chargeholders."

College Track Inc., a New York research firm that specializes in the college financial market, estimates that about 68 percent of undergraduates possess a general credit card, according to March 1991 figures.

An estimated 4 million students are cardholders, according to estimates by banks, card companies and Credit Card News, a trade magazine. Figures from June 1990 show that about 40 percent of all students own a specialized credit card such as department store and gas cards.

The 68 percent figure shows a 7 percent increase since 1988, and College Track vice president Jim Knepper says that increase "is almost exclusively because of the (marketing) push" by creditors.

Although 7 percent may not sound like a lot, that figure represents an increase of 1.3 million people, according to Credit Card News.

Some of the most common cards held by students are Discover, Visa, Mastercard and American Express.

"What we did about a year ago was start a nationwide direct-mailing campaign and a 'Take One' display campaign for students," says Amy Sudol, spokeswoman for Chase Manhattan Bank, one of the largest student Visa and Mastercard creditors nationwide. "It was an excellent move for Chase to expand into the student market. "We made credit available when people need it the most."

Chase isn't the only one. American Express has enticed students for a couple of years now with a bonus for card membership — airplane ticket vouchers that give students significantly discounted airfare rates.

"We figure students travel a great deal so this is a way of giving them a benefit based on their lifestyle," Wasserman said.

Most of the credit and charge corporations offer students the same card benefits that other members receive, such as purchase protection, extended warranties and insurance on rental cars.

In addition, Chase, American Express and others also send student cardholders quarterly magazines and other publications that give them credit and money management tips.

"In school you're learning to budget a lot of things — time, expenses and credit — for the first time. We think (American Express) is a good first card because it's a pay-as-you-go system," Wasserman said.

American Express charges cardholders an annual fee ($35) to have the card and members avoid interest by paying their entire balance at the end of each month. Visa, Discover and Mastercard sometimes charge a smaller annual fee, but they always offer cardholders the option of paying off their balance at their own pace at a varied monthly interest rate. The rate is currently estimated at about 18 to 20 percent.

Students "have been very responsible users of credit," Sudol says.

Not only have students proved to be a stable short-term credit risk while in school, students also tend to pay off in the long run.

"Students, as they come out of school, will be making more money," Knepper says. "If (companies) can influence them now, they will most likely have a customer for life."

College Track estimates a student's monthly average bill at $94. Knepper says students have the same approximate default rate on credit cards as other adults.

Still, some worry about the temptation first-time cardholders face. Many students offer testimony to back-up those concerns.

The Ohio State Daily Lantern quoted senior Mary Ann Wargo as saying: "I used (a credit card) for my tuition, and then my car broke down and I had to use another card. Next I started buying clothes, and now my credit is up to the limit." Wargo owes about $1,500.

University of Maine student Tony Sierra wound up owing $2,400 on his Visa and Discover cards.

"I told myself I'd be rational with the cards, but then you start to think of it as a lifestyle. You get what you want and pay for it later," Sierra told The New York Times.

Sierra and Wargo are not alone. Paul Ebert, president of the Consumer Credit Counseling Services of Central Ohio, says although the number of students in credit trouble isn't unusually high, some do encounter difficulties. CCCS of Central Ohio is part of the National Foundation for Consumer Credit which helps people solve debt problems, provides counseling and can establish debt repayment plans between people and their creditors. The service is available nationwide except in Wisconsin, which is currently working on establishing offices.

"Having credit takes a lot of self-control," Ebert says. "Students don't have the substantial funds to pay (cards) off when they load them up. For students, the emergency aspect is what you need a credit card for — not for daily expenses. It's tempting to use it for tuition, books, groceries, clothes ... but you will pay for yesterday's sins tomorrow."

Many institutions allow students to charge tuition, fees and books. A number of grocery stores and movie theaters now accept credit as well.

"We'll take the credit card payments over the phone," says Stephanie Swaford of the Indiana University Bursar's Office. "About a third of our students charge their tuition." At Indiana that cost runs about $1,500 a semester for in-state students and $4,000 for out-of-state students, she says.

LivWELL Offers A Healthy Dose Of Information And Entertainment

BY JEFF HOLEMAN
News Writer

LivWell '91, the campus health promotion fair is scheduled to be held Wednesday, September 25. The fair, in its seventh year, will be held on the north lawn of the University Union and in Room 100 of the Union from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m.

The annual promotion event involves various free activities. Some of these free activities include blood pressure checks and body fat tests, and information about sun protection and recycling among other subjects.

Deborah Haywood, assistant director for health promotion, said that every year the number of students that attend the fair increases greatly. "Last year over 200 students attended because of support from faculty and volunteers from the community and the university who donate their time to work LivWell."

Haywood said that volunteers from the community assist with many of the activities and volunteers from the university assist with other aspects. Sororities and fraternities, LivWell assistants, Wellness area students in the residence halls and other students volunteer. "However, I still need volunteers," she said.

One of the organizations assisting in the "other aspects" is the Student Government Association. SGA is supporting LivWell '91 by covering the cost of t-shirts to be given as prizes to volunteers. SGA President Curtis Wilson said, "It's a worthwhile cause. Everyone needs to be educated on what your body can and cannot do. Donating money is one way SGA can help. It's a way to show we're interested and care about the students."

Haywood said new activities for the event are the mini-fitness workshops, massages for students, free hearing screenings, and information about recycling on campus. The mini-fitness workshops will last about 20 minutes and will be conducted by the Intramurals Department. The massages will be held in Room 100 along with the hearing screenings.

Haywood said, "The message to students in health and well-being is that it doesn't have to be a chore. It can be fun. There are things that we all can do to improve our lives."

ROCHESTER, N.Y. — The president of Rochester Institute of Technology, whose ties with the Central Intelligence Agency are being investigated by a special college panel, announced plans to retire June 1, 1992.

Dr. M. Richard Rose made the statement during his annual "State of the Institution" address Sept. 3. He has been president of the school 12 years.

Controversy erupted earlier this year over the college's CIA research contracts, which total more than $1 million. Rose, who still defends the school's ties with the agency, invited further ire when he took a four-month sabbatical at CIA headquarters in Langley, Va.

The disclosure led to student protests, an unusual occurrence at the conservative campus, and a newspaper investigation.

The committee, which will present its findings in the fall, is examining the propriety of the school's ties to the CIA. The agency has an interest in photography and the field of imaging science, both of which are specialties of the 13,000-student college.

The CIA's presence on campuses frequently has been a target for student protesters. In April, noisy demonstrators forced CIA job recruiters off campus at the University of Oregon. In February, students waved placards and chanted outside Yale University's Career Services building to protest the presence of CIA interviewers on school grounds.

Need cash fast? No problem. Drive to the bank, the mall, the grocery store, the bookstore, just about anywhere, and use an automated teller machine.

ATMs are nothing new to the college-aged. In fact, a recent survey by Plus System, Inc., an international network of bank ATMs, found that adults between 18 and 24 years old conduct more transactions through bank machines than any other group and 40 percent of them have ATM cards.

"We anticipate an increase not only because of better access on campuses but because people are now growing up in an environment where computers are readily available," said Ron Reed, general manager of Plus Systems, Inc.

PALO ALTO, Calif. — Stanford University officials are trying to clean up their finances after a billing scandal forced the school to return more than a million dollars to the government.

The latest discovery by an outside firm analyzing the Stanford books is that the school improperly billed the government for upkeep of a mausoleum where the university's namesake is buried.

Stanford voluntarily returned the money — about $1,500 a year for six years — and is continuing its probe into its accounts.

"It's like weeding a garden," says Larry Horton, vice president of public affairs. "We knew we would uncover incorrect things and this is just the latest one of them."

Recently, about 2,300 university employees who approve expenditures were required to take a class on how to handle research funding, Horton said. One of those employees was President Donald Kennedy, who announced his resignation in August 1992 because of the billing scandal.

PITTSBURGH — The results of a recent Carnegie Mellon University study came as no surprise to most medical experts — high stress levels can almost double a person's chances of getting a cold.

That finding is nothing to sneeze at if you're a college student. Health experts estimate that the common cold accounts for about one-third of the illnesses for which students seek treatment.

"There's no question that a link exists" between stress and its suppression of the body's immune system, says Barbara Driscoll, health center director at Clark University in Worcester, Mass.

Driscoll thinks that link is especially strong in college students. "Students are a very high stress group because they are always in such a state of flux," she said.

The Question Is, Do Really Want To Know?

SIDELINE SENSATIONS

Patrick Fowler, Sports Editor
Every fall, because of my position as a sports editor, I am asked two questions constantly by rapid football fanatics.

Who will win the mythical collegiate national championship? And who will win the professional super bowl?

Well, to be perfectly accurate, the queries are posed in a slightly different manner. A 6'8 biceps-exploding gorilla spins me around in the local K-Mart, places a huge paw on my shoulder and demands I answer his questions or suffer the consequence.

"Hey, reporter-dude!" he bellows. "You are picking the (insert team name here) to win it all, right?" In a time span quicker than a nanosecond I blurt out, "Yeah, sure, oh look at the time." "Hey, I'm not stupid!"

I personally may think that their franchise's draft choice is the bonehead play of the year. I may also believe his college alma mater is accumulating so many new NCAA sanctions, that their next great team will be in a century. But hey, I'm not telling him that. You see, I'm kind of funny about keeping my organs inside my body.

As you can see I'm not really a big fan of pre-season, mid-season, or for that matter any season prognosticate guess at the future.

One reason is I'm not too good at it which puts my life in a precarious position (See example above). The second reason is no matter how long you analyze, scrutinize, observe, and dissect a particular team, they will still do things that will shoot up your blood pressure. Sports are very unpredictable. At any time, a no-name can upset a major talent or a mighty champion may lose it all to opponent he should be able to defeat in his sleep.

Sports often don't add up and the unexpected and improbable often become reality.

But, hey, try telling that to the viewer who just lost 20 bucks because he listened to some some Joe Schmoe expert on TV.

The prime culprit in adding anxiety to fans lives and ruining many restful weekends are the statisticians and odds makers. A group of 50 nerdy guys who lock themselves in a small VW camper and get excited crunching totally meaningless data and numbers. Have you ever wondered where IRS tax agents come from? Well, now you know.

These people's whole purpose is to confuse you. They'll tell you, that the middle linebacker, Billy Bob Bruskenski, will on odd days, in months ending in "y", when the thermometer reads above 68.5, rush the quarterback from the right side of the line to avoid the oncoming bright sun.

I say, "Who cares?" All I want to know is "Can he sack the quarterback consistently or not?"

Better still, are the odds makers, who answer simple questions like, "Who will win the game and why?" like a politician caught in an scandal. They hem and haw and double-talk everything, saying a lot but not what needs to be said.

"I think the Vikings can defeat the Broncos if they hold-on to the ball as long as possible, have few or little turnovers, and apply constant defensive pressure on quarterback John Elway."

Well, thank-you so very much for your enlightenment. That advice is only the whole purpose of the game--to have your team score and keep your opponent in check. And think, many of them are paid hundreds of thousands of dollars for that expert opinion.

Hmmm, maybe I'm in the wrong business. Oh, well, I've wandered off my original purpose in writing this column--to give you, the reader, my personal picks (drum roll here).

Here goes my best shot.

Seahawks Down Buccaneers In Three

BY PATRICK FOWLER
Sports Editor

The key phrase for the UNCW Seahawk volleyball team entering last Saturday's Sept. 14, contest against Charleston Southern was "luck it up". The Seahawks (2-3) did just that, diving and tossing their bodies all over the Hanover Hall floor in a 15-11, 15-6, 15-13 victory over the Buccaneers (3-1).

"This effort was a 100 percent improvement from last game", sophomore outside hitter Bobbi Pate said. "The loss to Duke was real let-down for us. We beat ourselves in that game."

UNCW played erratic in the Blue Devils contest. The Seahawks were swept in three games, 15-2, 15-5, 15-4, as the offense could only muster 11 total points for the match.

Miscommunication, lack of leadership, and intimidation were some of the problems, players addressed in a forty-five minute team meeting before a light practice.

"We lack intensity, lack someone taking charge on the court, and we didn't set our goals for what we need to do against them," junior outside hitter Jennifer Jamieson said.

Against Charleston, Seahawk players dove, stretched, and dug after every ball they could reach. The aggressiveness paid off as UNCW was able to dictate both the game tempo and play at the net.

Three Seahawks, Kim Cavanaugh (15), Jennifer Jamieson (10), and Amy Chilausky (10) had 10 kills or more for UNCW.

Junior setter Sheldon Plentovich also had back-to-back solid games. Plentovich recorded 79 assists in the two home matches, 31 in a losing effort against the Blue Devils, Thursday and 48 against the Buccaneers Saturday.

"Kim (Cavanaugh), Bobbi (Pate), and Sheldon (Plentovich), had solid games for us this week," head coach Kathy McDaniel said. "The team played tonight as a unit instead of six separate individuals on the court."

Assistant coach Dave Lynch agreed, "We played both sharp and with confidence." "Our serving game was much improved from Thursday night."

UNCW started the night slowly, having the same early service problems the team poses in the Duke contest.

The Buccaneers, meanwhile found the open places on the court and took the early lead. The Seahawks however were able to shake-off their sluggishness and battled back. The 9 all, Cavanaugh ignited the Seahawk charge with a two-handed block that excited the crowd. The senior followed with a kill as UNCW pushed by Charleston Southern to take game 1, 15-11.

Game two saw UNCW in cruise control. Outside hitters, Amy Chilausky, Jamieson, and Cavanaugh paced the Seahawk attack ending points quickly with quick powerful

"The biggest problems for us out on the court was the size of the UNCW blockers," Buccaneers coach Amir Khalodi said. "They really hit the ball hard and we couldn't control it."

Game three saw UNCW run out to a 13-5 lead before holding off a furious Buccaneers comeback to win 15-13. The Seahawks meet Virginia Commonwealth at home Sept. 21.

Game time is noon.

'Hawks Tie After 2 O.T.'s

BY DAVID BARNHARDT

UNCW soccer team played to a 2-2 overtime tie against non-conference opponent Methodist College Sept. 14 on Brooks Field.

The Seahawks forced the tie on forward Peter Clay's header with 2 minutes and 56 seconds left in the second overtime.

The tie moved the Seahawks' record to 0-2-1 for the '91 season. UNCW still leads the series against Methodist 10-2-4.

"I thought the players showed good character in getting the tie," head coach Blackmore said.

The first half was scoreless, despite many close shot attempts by both teams. Fullback Carlos Davis anchored the Seahawk defense coming up with several key stops.

"Carlos played a good game for us," Blackmore said. "He was steady for us in the back."

Goalie Tom Redmond again played a solid game in the goal. Redmond is currently ninth in the Colonial Athletic Conference standings in save averages. The 5'11 senior 72 percent save average in 180 minutes.

The Seahawks scored first, 6:44 minutes into the game on a Greg Diamond blast into the upper right corner of the goal. Alex Sibinovic assisted on the score.

The teams battled each other to a draw for most of the second half. Both teams had scoring opportunities but couldn't convert as the defense on both sides stiffen.

Methodist broke the drought netting a goal on a Charlie Marras boot with three minutes left in regulation. The shot just eluded Seahawk goalie Tom Redmond's outstretched hands as he leaped horizontally to block the shot.

The Seahawks were unable to score in the remaining minutes, forcing the overtime.

Methodist struck first in the overtime period scoring on Jay Haley to Justin Carey connection, 13:39 minutes into the extra period. Carey's shot found the lower right corner of the goal. This was the only score of the first overtime.

The second overtime period was also a defensive battle which each team defensive walls bonding but not breaking.

The Seahawks tied the score and the game in period two on Clay slip in between defenders and outleaped them to the ball. Clay buried the goal redirecting it past a surprised Monarch goalkeeper, Lance Watkins, who was following the original path of the ball. Midfielder, Greg Diamond assisted on the play centering the ball to Clay from 18 feet out.

Clay, who had sat out the first overtime period, was inserted back into the game by Blackmore because of his heading ability. Blackmore had alluded to early in pre-season that Clay would be one of the players he would turn to step-up and fill the vacancy left by CAA standout Chris George.

"Pete heads the ball better than anyone in the league," Blackmore said. "He isn't an explosive player like Chris (George). Pete grinds things out and gets the job done."

The Seahawks next game is in Norfolk, Va. against new CAA foe Old Dominion. UNCW won the only meeting of the two squads, a 3-2 victory in overtime in 1978.

Youth Not A Factor For The Golf Team

BY STEVE MCDANIEL
Sports Writer

Coach Lea Dudley claims that the Lady Seahawks golf team is the youngest in the country. With a squad made up of three sophomores and four freshmen, she's probably not stretching the truth.

But, after finishing a strong third out of 11 teams in their first tournament, in Daytona Beach, Fla., over the weekend, it appears that youth is not necessarily a bad thing.

"These girls don't realize how good they can be yet," Dudley said after returning to campus following the University of Central Florida Invitational tournament.

The Lady Seahawks finished with a team total of 628, just one shot behind second-place Mississippi and 17 strokes behind the host UCF team.

"The team that won this tournament (UCF's Black squad) played in the NCAA nationals last year and returned all of their players," Dudley said. "And we finished just a few strokes out, playing all underclassmen."

Sophomores, Gwen Gravina and Lee Ann Walker, two of Dudley's "veterans", are considered the co-leaders on the seven-person squad.

Gravina put together two solid rounds at the tournament. The sophomore fired a one-over-par 74 on Saturday and followed it with a 77 on Sunday, to finish in a tie for second in the overall individual standings. Walker's rounds of 78 and 75 put her two strokes behind her teammate.

"Gwen has the potential to be an All-American," Dudley said. "But she has to put forth a consistent effort and try to motivate herself to play up to that potential."

She added, "Lee Ann has been playing well in the pre-season and was our No. 1 qualifier for the opening tournament. Her scores have been consistently competitive."

Dudley is encouraged by her team's strong showing, and she emphasized the need for the players to gain experience in winning as well as playing.

"I try to put together a competitive schedule," she said. "It gives my players a chance to improve by competing against top teams and top players."

"That's one reason why we play several tournaments in Florida, because most of the stronger teams will be there, like the University of Georgia, UCF and the other Florida schools ... but I don't want these girls to think 'we were only one shot out of second,' I want them to believe that they can compete with and beat any team they play."

Because of the Lady Seahawks' youth and inexperience, Dudley spends as much time as she can helping her players improve their skills. However, the NCAA limits structured practice time to 20 hours a week.

"If a girl needs help for three or four hours on a particular part of her game, then limited practice time can be a problem," Dudley said.

But Dudley sees more positive than negative with a roster full of freshmen and sophomores. Playing together as a unit without impending losses from graduation should result in an experienced, close-knit group.

"With a year of experience and one or two additions to the group I hope now, we'll be dynamic," Dudley said.

The Lady Seahawks' next tournament is scheduled for Oct. 11-13 at the University of South Florida's Invitational in Tarpon Springs, Fla.

Prostate Problems

Helms Has Cancer

BY JOHN MONK AND DAVID PERLMUTT
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., diagnosed in May with a rare bone disease, has prostate cancer as well.

Following days of media speculation, Helms acknowledged Monday he has cancer.

Dr. Robert Krasner, attending physician for Congress, said the cancer was caught early and Helms is expected "to make a complete and uneventful recovery."

Helms, 69, said he is keeping his busy schedule while undergoing periodic radiation treatment at Bethesda Naval Medical Hospital, about 4 miles north of Washington.

"I have experienced no side-effects as a result of the radiation treatments," Helms said.

In recent days, Raleigh, N.C., television station WRAL, quoting unidentified sources, said that Helms had cancer and was undergoing chemotherapy — a type of therapy that sometimes causes nausea and other unpleasant side effects.

Monday, responding to news reporters who waited outside his office, Helms issued a statement about the cancer, but denied undergoing chemotherapy.

Helms also said his cancer has not slowed him down, and he instructed his press secretary, Eric Lundgren, to issue a list of recent actions he's taken on the Senate floor to show that Helms is still active.

Helms has missed at most one vote because of his cancer, Lundgren said.

Helms asked Krasner to issue a letter concerning his evaluation and treatment for prostate cancer. He sent the letter to Helms and it read in part:

"In June, 1991, at the time of your routine follow-up for prostatic hypertrophy (excessive prostate growth), a routine blood test, the Prostatic Specific Antigen, was found to be slightly elevated.

"Subsequent urologic consultation and evaluations demonstrated an early cancer of the prostate and radiation therapy was initiated. You are expected to make a complete and uneventful recovery."

In May, doctors diagnosed Helms with a rare bone disease that is painful but seldom fatal.

Called Paget's disease, it strikes middle-aged and elderly people, disrupting the normal process of rebuilding bone. Helms is taking medication for the disease, which can leave bones weakened, thickened or deformed.

The disease mostly affects Helms' hips, causing him to limp.

Reporters asked Helms on Monday if the cancer is slowing him down.

"Well, I've been going through

Troops Sent to Iraq

BY CHARLES GREEN AND MARK THOMPSON
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

UNITED NATIONS — The Bush administration announced Tuesday evening it was dispatching 96 Patriot missiles and about 1,300 troops to Saudi Arabia Wednesday as a defensive measure in case hostilities erupt in the region.

The move, which the administration had said last week it was considering, came as Iraq appeared ready to cool a boiling confrontation with the United States over the rights of a U.N. inspection team to search for nuclear and chemical weapons.

U.N. Security Council President Jean-Bernard Merimee of France said Tuesday night that the Security Council had received a letter from Iraq which the council considers "an unconditional acceptance" of the United Nations' authority to make the inspections unimpeded.

Iraq had continued to detain 44 U.N. officials in Baghdad for a second day Tuesday, barring them from leaving with documents apparently detailing Iraq's efforts to develop nuclear weapons. Iraq accused the lead inspector of being a U.S. spy.

Merimee did not disclose the text of the Iraqi letter and details of the inspection procedures were to be worked out over the next few days.

Despite the apparent Iraqi acquiescence, Merimee said the Security Council "expresses its strong condemnation of the way Iraqi authorities have repeatedly prevented the inspectors from carrying out their duty." He said the council "demands that the inspection team be immediately allowed to leave the site where they are kept without any conditions" and with all the documents they deem appropriate.

The Security Council did not spell out what would happen if its warning is ignored. Also, the Bush administration had no comment early Tuesday evening on the apparent Iraqi change of heart.

The developments came at the end of a hectic day of Minors Coming

BY LAURA KEETER
Staff Writer

Chancellor James R. Leutze has endorsed the resolution passed by the Faculty Senate to adopt a minor curriculum. The Faculty Senate resolution proposes definitions for majors and minors.

A minor is defined as "an approved course of study designed to provide students with an overview of the essential knowledge and methods of a subject and with a sample of its depth. A minor must consist of at least 18, but not more than 24, semester hours of credit, at least six of which are at the 300-400 level."

Cartoon Raises Racial Questions On Campus

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor in Chief

A controversial editorial cartoon which appeared in the Raleigh News and Observer on Sept. 17 was presented to the Student Government senate at Monday night's meeting. Senators were invited to write protest letters to the News and Observer in response to the cartoon.

Senator Duane "Ziggy" Nix presented the cartoon which he received at the last meeting of the North Carolina Association of Student Governments (NCASG).

The drawing was presented at the SGA presidents meeting at the conference, Nix said. UNCW Student Body President Curtis Wilson was at that meeting, but refused to comment on the issue. "I have an opinion," Wilson said, "I just don't want to give it."

The cartoon portrays a bus with "UNC Lines" painted on the side and "Knowledge" listed as its destination. Inside of the bus is a black man looking for a seat. In the back of the bus is a group of black men and women. Among that group is a black man labeled "Black Campus" saying, "Come on back where it's comfy, Bro!"

Copyright laws prevent The Seahawk from reprinting the cartoon.

Under the resolution, minors are optional for students. They are also optional for departments, which can choose whether or not to offer a minor or minors.

"The University Curriculum Committee designed the minor and wrote the policy that would allow minors," said Dr. Kenneth Spackman, who was Chairperson of the committee last year.

"It was the consensus of the committee that students who wish to have a mini-concentration have their efforts recognized," said Dr. Spackman. "If a student would like, he can use some of the room in the 124 hours to choose a minor among the electives," he said.

The cartoon referred specifically to an incident on the campus of NC Central which resulted in the resignation of Chancellor Tyrone R. Richmond...

Nix said he interpreted the cartoon to say that "black schools aren't getting anything from the UNC system."

Steve Ford, associate editor at the News and Observer said the cartoon was intended to mean something different. Ford said the drawing portrayed "what we see as a movement on some black campuses toward resignation."

The cartoon referred specifically to an incident on the campus of NC Central which resulted in the resignation of Chancellor Tyrone R. Richmond, Ford said.

Ford said that while he had not received any protest letters concerning the cartoon, some readers called in to ask about its meaning.

Preventative Measures Must Be Taken

BY DENISE SUTTON
Staff Writer

Considering the 11,000 staff, faculty and student population, UNCW could be described as a city within a city. And just as any city must deal with crime and crime prevention, so must the community of UNCW. Students can help make the campus a safer place through awareness and basic preventative measures.

UNCW is currently addressing the widely publicized and dangerous practice of residence hall door propping. Since the residence hall doors lock automatically on the outside, some residents prop open the doors for convenience.

Galloway Hall is experimenting with a prop alarm system which alerts the night receptionist when someone goes in or out of the residence hall. According to Hunter Davis, Crime Prevention Officer with Campus Police, this prop alarm system is effective and probably will be installed in the other residence halls.

"Apathy is the biggest thing to overcome," said Davis about the attitudes concerning crime prevention. Davis advises students not to give out residence hall security combinations to friends. "They may be your friend now but what about a couple of months down the road?" said Davis. Giving out security combinations and door propping puts everyone in the residence hall at a risk.

There are many other precautions students can take to avoid dangerous situations and insure safety.

Davis suggested that students use common sense, such as: not walking alone at night and traveling in groups whenever possible.

The Seahawk Shuttle is also available and provides transportation on campus from 6-12 p.m. Sunday through Thursday, and 6-9 p.m. on Friday. If a student is out past these times, they can call a security guard for an escort.

"If a student doesn't see a security guard, they can call the office," said Davis, "anytime someone doesn't feel safe all they have to do is pick up the phone and call." Campus Police provide this escort service from 8 a.m. to 2 a.m., after 2 a.m. they provide an escort on availability basis.

Campus Police have also gone through special training to help them in dealing with sexual assault cases. And as part of the sexual assault protocol, a female officer is scheduled on every shift.

Davis explained that the Campus Police's biggest concern is to be effectively explain the options available to the victim. "Our wish is to do as much for them as possible," said Davis.

The Department of Justice's statistics reveal that women 16-24 years of age are more likely to be sexually assaulted than women of other ages. "This may be because these women are in more vulnerable positions," said Bea Schomp, rape crisis counselor with the Rape Crisis Center in Wilmington.

Schomp recommended that students avoid situations in which they may become isolated. "Be aware of your environment, know what's going on around you," Schomp suggested taking immediate action if in a situation that doesn't feel safe. "Be assertive, trust your gut feeling," stressed Schomp.

During 1990, the Rape Crisis Center served 179 primary sexual assault victims, some of which were men. Last month, RCC served 29 victims. Not all of these rapes were reported to law enforcement officials, however, reported rapes have increased 159.1% since 1989 in Wilmington. Schomp added that over 100,000 rapes were reported last year in the United States.

The Rape Crisis Center provides free and confidential counseling for victims of sexual assault. For more information call 341-5799 or 763-3695. To contact the UNCW Campus Police call 395-3184.

"What Is Graduate School?"

Biology Dept. Schedules Videoconference Oct. 2

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

The Biological Sciences Department and the Biology Club are sponsoring a videoconference entitled "What Is Graduate School?". The videoconference is scheduled for October 3 at 12:30 p.m. at Cameron Auditorium.

The program will be broadcast via satellite from sites at Washington, DC, Michigan State University, the University of Arizona and North Carolina State University. The videoconference will involve participants watching presentations and engaging in discussion.

The conference is divided into two segments: "What is graduate school?" and "How to choose one best suited to individual needs." Dr. Ron Stenmore, chairman of Biological Sciences, hopes students will learn about the differences between graduate and undergraduate school. "There are several differences. Graduate school is more independent. It involves more than reports; there is extensive research and library work involved. There are philosophical differences in the two. They're totally different and we want students to have an idea of what to expect."

The goals and objectives of the program are aimed at clearing up confusions faced by students, advisors and other faculty. During the program, the process of selecting a graduate school to suit one's needs will be discussed. It is a discussion will include the progression of panel members through the graduate school experience.

As well as addressing how to choose a school, the progression of majority and minority students through graduate school will be traced. Also, participants will be given the opportunity to submit questions for panel members prior to broadcast. This process is designed to ensure coverage of many issues facing those interested in graduate school.

"What Is Graduate School?" is geared toward students seeking a graduate school in the fields of science and engineering. "Students in those fields almost need a graduate degree now. But I encourage all students to attend as well as faculty. I hope those students who are undecided will come so they can make an informed decision," said Stenmore.

Students who choose graduate school are supported financially for the most part. "The school will pay to have you there." Interest was expressed by Biology Club members and biology majors about applying and selecting a graduate school.

Cheerleader Murder Plot Convicted Mother Requests New Trial, Cites Juror

BY BRUCE NICHOLS
Dallas Morning News

HOUSTON — Lawyers for the Channelview, Texas, mother convicted of trying to solicit the murder of her daughter's cheerleading rival demanded a new trial Tuesday, saying that an ineligible person was allowed to serve on her jury.

Defense lawyer Troy McKinney's motion says a person on deferred adjudication for a felony sat on the jury that sentenced Wanda Holloway to 15 years in prison earlier this month. Texas law prohibits anyone in that situation from serving, McKinney said.

McKinney said in an interview that a new trial is "automatic because the statute says it is." He estimated his chances of overturning the conviction at "about 99 percent," either before the trial judge or on appeal.

Harris County District Attorney John Holmes acknowledged a mistake was made in jury selection, but he also said he was not ready to concede it would require a new trial.

Holmes added, however, that his office might welcome a chance to retry Holloway. "Some people think she was under-sentenced," Holmes said, suggesting another trial might result in a longer prison term.

Although state District Judge George Godwin was out of town, his office tentatively scheduled a hearing on the motion for Nov. 7.

Between now and the hearing date, Holmes said his office will consider whether to agree to a new trial or to fight the issue raised by McKinney on appeal.

Holmes said his office plans to inquire whether defense lawyers knew that juror Daniel Michael Enriquez, a 30-year-old used-car salesman from Spring, Texas, was on five years' deferred adjudication in a 1988 cocaine possession case.

If they did and "laid behind a log," planning to use the issue on appeal if Holloway was convicted, Holmes said his office might be able to defeat the bid to overturn her conviction.

"There was a bench conference about this specific juror (during jury selection)," Holmes said. That means special attention was paid to Enriquez by the judge and lawyers, even though this particular issue wasn't raised, he said.

McKinney said neither the defense lawyers, the prosecutors nor the judge knew Enriquez was not qualified.

Enriquez apparently did nothing wrong during the jury selection process, McKinney said.

He filled out his juror information form accurately. He wrote "yes" in response to the question whether the juror or any close friend or relative had been involved in a criminal case. He wrote "1988 possession of a controlled substance, deferred adjudication."

Neither prosecutors nor defense lawyers asked whether Enriquez was on deferred adjudication.

Deferred adjudication is a special kind of probation under which a defendant pleads guilty or no contest and the judge defers finding them guilty while they serve a period of probation. If the defendant successfully completes probation, the case is dismissed; if not, the defendant can be convicted and sentenced to prison.

Holmes said he was unhappy that the oversight occurred. There are several points at which the system is supposed to screen out people ineligible to serve. "Obviously that screen has some holes in it," he said.

"I don't like it. Everytime we try a case, we're burning up resources assigned to us. I don't think that (retrying cases) is a good exercise," he said.

But he did not criticize assistant district attorneys Casey O'Brien and Mike Anderson, who tried the case. "Both of these guys don't need any more practice. They're good lawyers," Holmes said.

McKinney raised some other issues in his motion for new trial.

He questioned Judge Godwin's ruling excluding some testimony favorable to the defense, and he challenged the judge's instructions to the jury.

Holloway is free on bond pending her appeal.

She was convicted Sept. 3 of soliciting the capital murder of Verna Heath, a neighbor. Prosecutors said she hatched the plot in hopes that grief would keep Heath's daughter from competing with Holloway's daughter for a junior high cheerleading position.

Holloway took the witness stand to deny she was ever serious about killing anyone, and her lawyers suggested she was set up by her ex-husband and his brother, who secretly recorded for police conversations about planning the killing.

Noisy Planes To Be Grounded

BY BRIAN BARON
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

WASHINGTON — The Department of Transportation, acting to reduce airport noise, announced final rules Tuesday for phasing out the use of older, louder commercial aircraft by the turn of the century.

Calling the new rules a "balanced national policy," Transportation Secretary Samuel Skinner announced a final schedule that airlines must follow to rid the nation's airports of 2,270 of the noisiest aircraft, which make up about 55 percent of the total U.S. commercial fleet.

"This is real progress," said Skinner, who noted that the $4.5 billion cost of complying with the rules could be passed on to airline passengers through higher fares. "This is the most significant progress on airport noise in many years."

About 2.7 million Americans are now exposed to what transportation officials term "significant" airplane noise based on where they live and the flight patterns of aircraft. The new rules are designed to cut that figure 85 percent over the next decade.

About 2.7 million Americans are now exposed to what transportation officials term "significant" airplane noise.

The plan updates a 1990 federal law forcing airlines to update or stop using older, noisier planes, including some DC-8s, DC-9s, Boeing 707s, Boeing 727s, and Boeing 737s.

Airlines had criticized earlier versions of the timetable, saying they did not allow financially strapped airlines flexibility in complying with the law, but the final rules create an appeals procedure that appears to alleviate these complaints.

While the new rules were generally applauded by airline industry and local government officials, they objected, for different reasons, to a key part of the rules that deals with the ability of local communities to set airport noise standards more rigid than the federal standard.

That part of the new rules would allow airports that already have stricter guidelines, such as Washington National Airport, to maintain their standards.

While calling the new rules a "significant milestone," Robert Aaronson, president of the Air Transport Association, a trade group for airline companies, said noise rules should be the same nationwide.

"Benefits can be assured for the entire nation only if local communities don't unilaterally establish their own phase-out schedules," Aaronson said in a statement. He also put the cost of complying with the standard at $100 billion.

Charles Price, the executive director of the National Organization to Insure a Sound-controlled Environment, a coalition of local governments concerned about airport noise, criticized the regulation for the exact opposite reason.

"While the regulations do not prohibit localities from moving faster than the federal government, there's some strong language that focuses on any locality that tries to do this," said Price. "And we don't like that because it comes down hard on any community that tries to go faster."

Near-nude Car Wash Outlawed

BY BOB ORTEGA
Seattle Times

SEATTLE — The "Club Exstasy Five" can keep dancing — so long as they go forth and wash no more — cars, that is.

Last week, King County police said a charity car wash by five swimsuit-clad dancers in the parking lot of the suburb of SeaTac's first and only strip club, violated the city's adult-entertainment ordinance.

Now City Manager Doug Sutherland says the city won't pursue legal action — as long as it doesn't happen again.

"The cost of litigation isn't worth the issue if it isn't going to happen again," Sutherland said.

Had the city pursued the alleged violations, dancers could have faced fines and misdemeanor charges, and the club could have faced fines and possible revocation of its license.

City attorney Bob McAdams said anyone else in SeaTac can wash a car in public wearing a bathing suit. He said it's only illegal when Club Exstasy dancers don bathing suits and wash cars in the club's lot.

He cited a city ordinance saying no activity "occurring on the premises (of a nude dance club) shall be visible at any time from any public place."

McAdams said "activity" means courts go by what an average person would find reasonable.

The purpose of the law is to prevent licensed adult entertainment or similar activity in public view, he said.

To McAdams, the car wash last Wednesday was reasonably similar to adult entertainment.

"It's a clear violation," he said. "The obvious purpose of it was to advertise for the club."

Club owner Larry Miller said that logic absurd. The car wash was to raise money for an orphanage, he said.

"There's common sense when it comes to these things," he says. "Even I wouldn't have the girls go out there in pasties and G-strings — though the court says that isn't nudity."

"This is a blatant abuse of power and they know it, but due to the nature of the business, no one is inclined to step up and dispute it," he said. Nude dancing has few legal defenders, he said.

One of the five dancers, who would only give her stage name, "Scarlett," said, "We wanted to do the charity as a goodwill gesture because we've had so many problems with the city of SeaTac."

City officials tried to stop the club from opening by trying to revoke its business license and building permit. A city hearing examiner ruled in Miller's favor. Miller also won a separate King County Superior Court ruling that struck down some of the city's adult-entertainment-ordinance licensing restrictions.

Scarlett said the dancers were wearing normal swimwear when they washed cars, raising about $140 for a local orphanage, which Miller declined to name.

"If I were doing the same thing at a church car wash, no one would care," she said.

Meanwhile, Miller questioned why the police covertly videotaped the car-washing, an action King County police Lt. Craig Wilkie, who also serves as SeaTac police chief, stoutly defended.

"Reporters can go out and videotape. Why can't we do it?" he asked. "What's inappropriate about that?"

Wilkie, Sutherland and McAdams said they haven't watched the tape. Wilkie said it's stored in a police evidence locker.

Sutherland and Wilkie denied the city is targeting the club.

Helms

it for some time and I've known about this since July," Helms replied. "Have you noticed? Have you seen me slow down? OK, that's your answer."

Helms began his fourth six-year term in January. He said he plans to remain in office for a long time.

"Anybody who wants to start picking my successor better wait for about 11 years," he said.

The news of Helms' cancer comes during Prostate Cancer Awareness Week, during which free screenings will be conducted throughout the county.

Sen. Alan Cranston, D-Calif., announced last November he would not seek a fifth term after he was diagnosed with the disease. The prostate is a walnut-sized gland at the base of the male bladder that produces the fluids that help transport and nourish semen.

It is a common site of cancer, a malignant growth that can spread to other organs if not treated in time. Prostate cancer is the second most common cancer among U.S. men and second to lung cancer as the leading cancer killer of men.

This year, 122,000 men will be diagnosed with prostate cancer; 32,000 will die from it.

Confined to the prostate, doctors say the disease is curable. But as the cancer spreads, chances for cure go down.

"It is (similar) to kudzu; it can overtake everything in sight and eventually destroy it," said Dr. David Sommerstein, a Charlotte urologist.

"So the earlier you can diagnose the disease, the better chance you have of stopping it."

The chances of getting the cancer increase as men get older and their prostates enlarge. The average age at diagnosis is 70, but 20 percent of those afflicted are 65 and younger.

Research hasn't found a specific cause.

"There may be a hereditary history, or diet may contribute," said Charlotte urologist Timothy Gajewski. "But there is nothing that says exposure to this specific thing causes prostate cancer."

Annual screening for the disease, beginning at age 40, also is critical, he said. "That test can give us a lot of useful information."

Helms downplayed the significance of his cancer diagnosis.

"If the Lord let's me get by with having no more problem than this," he said, "I'll be blessed indeed."

"I didn't think it was that ambiguous," Ford said. He did say that editorial cartoons can easily be misconstrued.

The stand of the News and Observer was articulated in an editorial that appeared on Sept. 19.

The editorial stated, "[North Carolina] Central's future is as an open-minded and diverse place of higher learning — not as a fortress for one point of view, or one race against another."

As an example of what it called the re-segregation movement, the editorial quoted an unnamed NC Central senior who said, "This is a black university. We want black students, black administrators, black trustees. We want this campus to be so black that when you walk around at night you won't be able to see anything."

Nix said he didn't know whether he would still write a protest letter.

The president of the NCASG and the representatives from NC Central could not be reached for comment.

We're Missing A Certain Address

Student Body President Curtis Wilson deferred on giving the State of the University speech — again.

The constitution requires the student body president to give the speech at the first meeting of the SGA senate each semester. At the first meeting this year, Wilson announced that he was "postponing" the speech. He's been postponing it ever since.

At Monday's SGA meeting, he announced (not for the first time) that he would deliver the State of the University address at the next meeting. That meeting is coming up this Monday night. We'll all have to wait until then to hear the State of the University Address, or another report on the state of the State of the University Address.

Granted, missing the required date for a political address is hardly disastrous. One could probably argue that a student body president has more important matters to attend to — like, say, office renovation.

But Wilson's lack of action seems to be an indicator of his apathy when it comes to presenting a clear agenda for his term in office. The State of the University Address is an opportunity for Wilson to articulate to the SGA senate and the students of UNCW what problems and strengths he sees in the University and what he plans to do about them.

Wilson, by his own proclamation (and to his credit), is not a politician in the typical sense of the word. Even so, he is in a political office and is required to participate in some of its activities. These activities might seem unimportant when compared to the purely governmental duties of the student body president, but nonetheless they are vital to maintain an informed when he refused to comment on the political cartoon which enraged some student government members at this and other North Carolina universities. His reason for refusing comment on the cartoon? He didn't give one. His only explanation was "call me stubborn."

Sarcasm may replace a firm stand (on either side of the issue) in Wilson's mind, but it shouldn't. It is also disturbing to speculate as to whether Wilson is presenting this type of image for UNCW when he attends meetings of the North Carolina student governments, like the one where the cartoon issue came up. The SGA delegates from other schools may decide that Wilson, in his silence, is not stubborn, but stupid. That is unfortunate because he isn't stupid.

Let's hope Wilson partially fulfills his constitutional duties Monday and delivers the State of the University Address. Let's also hope that Wilson keeps his more in touch with his views as president in the future.

Letter from the Editor We're Making The Paper Better For You

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor in Chief

As you may have noticed in this week's edition, The Seahawk has a new source for material to be published.

I'm happy to announce that The Seahawk now subscribes to the Knight-Ridder Tribune news service. The service will allow us to bring to you the readers a variety of news stories, features, opinion, and art. While there is only a smattering of these in this issue, we plan to integrate the service into the paper more fully in the coming weeks.

The Seahawk can now provide you with information for three main sources. You will see national and world news via Knight-Ridder. These will include politics, people, trends, money, and lifestyles. We also print stories from College Press Service (CPS) to inform you about what's happening at colleges and universities across the nation.

And, of course, we will continue to bring you news, features, and informational articles from our own staff about events on this campus.

In addition to our regular edition, we are working on some special projects of interest.

When basketball season rounds around, be sure to check out our special basketball preview section. We'll give you information on the players and coaches, preview the other teams in the CAA, and give you our predictions on how the Seahawks will fare on the hardwood this year.

Also look for a special travel insert in early January. We're digging up information you can use for your Spring Break. You'll read about some less traditional destinations that might bring you vacation bliss and save you some bucks in the mean time. And for those of you planning to join the line of vehicles heading south on I-95, we'll get the scoop on Daytona, Disney, and some other Florida hot spots.

As always, we're open for suggestions from the readers we serve. So lately, I invite you to let us know what you want from your student newspaper. What is important to you? Do you want more hard news, more music reviews, better coverage of your student group? Let us know.

We try to predict the needs of the UNCW student, but it's hard to do it without your input. (I only recently was made aware of the significant demand for crossword puzzles on this campus!) So keep us informed about how you want to be informed.

Best of luck and happy reading.

Treat Your Physical Being Well

Next week is LivWell 91, the annual health fair sponsored by the Office of Health Promotion.

To live well demands our making some incredibly significant decisions about the way we live our lives. LivWell invites you to adopt a wellness model for checking your priorities and making relevant decisions.

First of all, the wellness model is witness to the reality that we are multifaceted beings with a variety of dimensions in our life.

There are six different dimensions to us: physical, occupational, spiritual, intellectual, emotional and social/environmental.

Each of these dimensions is important to our well-being and demands some attention to our present state of being and the decisions we may need to make to improve our overall lifestyles.

Besides identifying these six dimensions, the wellness concept is based on the belief that overall health is dependent on our developing a high degree of self responsibility in addressing each of these areas in our lives.

The concept is also built around the convictions that each of these dimensions impinges on the others.

Emotional stress effects our physical health, and physical health effects our capacity to function in our classes.

From another perspective, mood and more research is telling us how important it is to determine what we eat and how we eat. Not only our physical health but our emotional well-being is directly related to our nutrition.

Yet again, to live in this world and go through the academic process without exploring our fundamental values and what it is that brings meaning to our life is to miss a significant source of positive energy that is available to us.

I believe it is incredibly important for us to realize how much we can affect our own state of well-being — how many choices we can make to improve our own lives.

To develop our sense of self responsibility is as important a goal to achieving total life well-being as is achieving good grades. We do not isolate the intellectual dimensions of our life and evaluate that on the basis of grades alone. The other dimensions are too important in shaping our future.

Achieving a state of well-being is much more than a program or a single day's event. It is a process in which you can choose to engage beginning now and for the rest of your life. Your health and your well-being are in your own hands and heart.

I hope and pray that you will live well and long and with joy.

The Fall Of The College President

BY JAMES G. DRISCOLL
Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel

For college presidents, the ivy is falling off the brick walls. The strain of perpetual fund-raising must have unhinged the president of all those lucrative universities with their multi-million dollar cash flows. At times academic chiefs act like charlatans, Wall Street manipulators or the merely deranged.

At the University of South Carolina, the former president pleaded no contest to tax evasion. A grand jury investigated financial connections between ex-president James Holderman and U.S. Sen. Mark Hatfield, R-Ore., and now it turns out one of the ties was to a covert fellowship program run by Holderman.

Hatfield's sons were among 381 students who were given $1.6 million in scholarships from this secret slash during Holderman's 13 years as president. Did he check out the financial need or academic records of these favored students? What is this, a course in ethics? He examined the influence of their parents, nothing else, before bestowing the scholarships.

At Stanford University in California, the president was forced to resign because of loss of confidence in him. And why not. He allowed, or didn't catch, or encouraged illegitimate use of "overhead" money provided as part of federal grants. The grand piano in the president's home needed repair, a yacht required maintenance and cocktail parties had to be paid for. Why not just grab the nearest cache of cash courtesy of unknowing taxpayers, and pay the bills?

At American University in Washington, D.C., the president departed after obscene telephone calls were traced to him. At the University of Central Florida in Orlando, the president left in a hurry after it was discovered he had made use of a limousine service linked to a prostitution ring. His explanation, that he frequently carried a change bag for his acting back, still brings snickers to Mickey Mouse town.

Is this just a flurry of unconnected incidents, unrelated to pressures felt by every college president? Or is there a commonality about them, signifying serious cracks in the academic facade so carefully buffed and polished over the decades?

It's easy to leap too far toward a facile conclusion, but still, the life of a college president often degenerates into sharply conflicting pressures which must be extraordinarily stressful. From above come the insistent demands of a board of trustees or regents, and a chancellor if it's a state university. Legislators, alumni and the general public call for this or that change or personal favor. In the bigger universities, the cesspool of athletics forces the president to defend or explain or punish so-called student-athletes and amoral coaches.

From the faculty, pampered and powerful, emerge cries for more pay, against discrimination and for even more comfortable working conditions. Parking spaces sometimes are valued as much as tenure, and an enraged professor about to lose his parking spot often vents his anger at the president.

Then the students, who are supposedly more placid than in earlier eras. That's not the full story. There's drug use, alcoholism, hazing, violent crime. Mr. Chips couldn't handle it well, not all of it, and neither can a college president.

Money and the endless begging for it festers at the core of the president's job. His favorite condiment? Curry. He has to cultivate rich people, no matter if they are certified jerks, and curry their financial favor.

If you have seen a college president do this — beg, while trying to seem he's not — you can't help but feel sympathy for him.

The humiliation must be awful. Or have he and his peers become so inured to unctuous flattery and the outstretched palm that it almost seems dignified?

At cocktail parties and dinners, the president is trotted out on display like a prize horse. On cue, he is expected to neigh and nicker, then nuzzle the bank accounts of those who are worth millions.

The drive for money grows more frantic as the campus cost squeeze tightens. Publications from three universities arrive at my house, and the theme is always money. More, more, and still more.

Excessive stress doesn't excuse bizarre or criminal behavior by college presidents. It may help to explain the fall from grace. Boards of trustees or regents might want to reorder the president's priorities, away from fund-raising and toward direct involvement in academic improvement. Somebody else can take the brunt of fund-raising — and keep it.

Or is this line of reasoning too gentle? Is simple arrogance the real cause of presidential malfeasance? (James G. Driscoll is a columnist for the Sun-Sentinel of Fort Lauderdale, Fla.)

Politicians Are Just Blowing Smoke

BY PHILLIP LOUGHLIN
Contributing Writer

Age makes all the difference. This revelatory thought came to me in the night on a silent, probably poisonous, mist. I reflected long on the significance of my discovery. It matters not how smart you are... how mature, or how juvenile. The only important thing is how old you are.

Actually, the idea is not my own. I got it from the legislators, state and federal. These are the same legislators that, years ago, had to be pressured to realize that if you are old enough to be drafted to go to war you should be old enough to vote. This is the same legislature that decided that eighteen was a good age to start drinking, then later decided to add a year, then to add two more years. Now, they figure, you can drink responsibly if you are twenty one. You can't handle a drink at sixteen (probably reasonable), it is beyond your capability at eighteen and even at twenty, you are not mature enough to behave rationally after a beer or two. But at twenty one, you can drink without risk.

Of course, I question this rationale. True enough, when I was sixteen, I drank, got drunk, and acted like an idiot. In doing so, I was completely outside the law. Apparently the legislators had something there. But then I turned eighteen. I was of legal age to drink. So, I drank, got drunk, and acted like an idiot. When they raised the age limit to nineteen, I was almost twenty one. Not to be confounded by mere technicalities, I went out with my nineteen year old friends. We drank, got drunk, and acted like idiots. When I turned twenty one, the law said I was old enough to responsibly drink hard liquor. So I drank, got drunk, etc. You see the pattern?

It occurred to me that how old I was really didn't matter. If I drank too much, I was going to get blitzed. If I got blitzed, I was going to act like an idiot. I have seen people in their forties get so drunk at a party that they took off all their clothes and jumped in a swimming pool. At the same time, I have seen sixteen year old kids drink one or two beers, quite rationally throughout the night. It just felt curiouser and curiouser as dear Alice once said.

Oblivious to evidence to the contrary, legislators still feel that setting age limits is the answer to all the problems of the world, or at least of their districts. There are age limits on voting, yet people still vote for the wrong candidate for the wrong reasons. There are age limits for consensual sex, but we have plenty of unwed mothers on both sides of the age line. There is even an age limit to be President of The United States, and God knows that's a pretty big regulation.

A long posted but relatively unenforced age limit has been in effect on the sale of tobacco products to minors (under sixteen). A few years ago, the age was raised to seventeen, and beginning next month, the age will go up to eighteen. How appropriate! In a move supposedly calculated to cut down on the number of young smokers, a law has been passed to create a whole new category of young criminals.

The sense of this age limit increase strikes me immediately. What a perfectly wonderful play! What a difference in mentality that one year is going to make! They'll certainly be old and wise enough to know that they are probably going to die if they smoke. Surely eighteen is old enough to be past that adolescent sense of immortality.

Of course the new law is going to make it real difficult for under-age kids to get cigarettes. I'm sure that all these sixteen and seventeen year old smokers are going to drop their habits right away. How will they get their cancer sticks? I just know all those cashiers are going to check identification for every pack of cigarettes they sell. And cigarette machines are notorious for checking I.D.

New Hanover County Health Department Director Bob Parker has vowed to go after all stores that don't check I.D. for tobacco sales. He has said he will take out the warrants himself if he has to. I'm sure every convenience store clerk in the county is shaking in his or her shoes. I know the judges must be shaking their heads too—As if the courts aren't packed enough because of stupid laws like this one.

It's difficult to understand the mind-set that makes legislators believe that they know our minds well enough to tell us when we can do something and when we can't. What further means of control does the government seek over our personal lives? How much longer until Big Brother has a permanent place in the homes and businesses of every one of us?

At any rate, most college students are eighteen or older, so the cigarette age limit probably won't affect you. You're old enough to kill yourselves if you want to.

2 Bands Succeed To Finals

Two bands from Wilmington, BILLYCLUB FEST and BIG HUNK O' CHEESE, have been selected to participate in the third annual NewSouth Music Showcase. Overall, 14 bands from North Carolina have been selected to attend the showcase.

NewSouth Music Showcase held in Atlanta, Ga. is the national music industry's Southeastern showcase and conference. The event selects, introduces and showcases the best of what's new in rock, alternative, pop, rhythm & blues, folk, urban contemporary and country music from across the nation.

In addition to showcasing new performers, the conference includes a trade show, panel seminars, workshops, singer-songwriter sessions, receptions and as a new addition this year the NewSouth People's Choice Awards. Phil Walden, Capricorn Records founder and music industry leader, will be the keynote speaker.

The event draws label executives, publishers, A&R representatives, concert promoters, booking agents, managers, club owners, attorneys and retailers from all over the country. Since its inception in 1989, NewSouth Music Showcase has featured 250 bands and over 20 of these bands have signed recording, publishing or production deals.

NewSouth '91 takes place Oct. 2-6, registration for students is $75. For more info call (404) 875-5579.

Dangerous Jackson Up For Knighthood

The details of Michael Jackson's contract with Epic Records (which is owned by Coca-Cola, which is owned by Columbia, which is owned by Sony - "We're turning Japanese, I really think so ...") were recently disclosed in Variety. According to the terms revealed, Jackson will receive $50 million up front in "perks and cash," 25% royalty, his own label, and a "commitment to collaborate in film, theatrical projects, and video."

Dangerous will be Jackson's first album in four years and execs are more than a little apprehensive about its outcome.

What began as a greatest hits album with a few new singles has grown into an album full of new songs, which has delayed its release considerably. It seems Jackson has been very secretive and is keeping all new material completely under wraps.

Even more upsetting for Epic execs is the fact that Jackson is being very shy about doing certain publicity for the album. He recently turned down an unprecedented two-cover, two-part interview deal with Rolling Stone. It has also been made clear that Jackson will definitely not follow the release of Dangerous with another tour.

Jackson apparently wants to concentrate on film projects over the next few years. Hoping to combine his new album release with film projects, he has completed a short "teaser film," directed by David Lynch and co-starring Macaulay Culkin, plus a video for the first single, "Black or White."

He is also reportedly "attached" to a new film project called Midnight for (surprise, surprise) Columbia Pictures. The film idea jelled when Jackson invited Caroline Thompson, who co-wrote Beetlejuice, and Larry Wilson, who penned Edward Scissorhands, to discuss an idea that eventually led to the script for Midnight. There is talk that Tim Burton, who not-so-coincidentally directed both the aforementioned films, will helm the project.

Incidentally, did you know that Jackson was very interested in playing the title role of Edward Scissorhands? Jackson as Scissorhands? Seems fitting. Of course, the idea of Jackson dressing up as a machismo medieval knight has a rather tantalizing appeal to it as well. "Yeah ... Right!"

In Tune With WLOZ

On A Quest For Mudhoney And Some Hip Lingo, Too

BY SHAMMON DAVIS
WLOZ Correspondent

Picture it ... six musically starved students set out on a quest to fill their hunger with some thrashing tunes. Their destination: the Cats Cradle in Chapel Hill, on the night of September 19th. Once there they were musically enriched by the band that leaves you slammering for more: MUDHONEY.

MUDHONEY, who formed in 1988 in Seattle, is off of SubPop records and sound very similar to IGGY AND THE STOOGES. They have a non-mainstream sound with a twist of 60's/ish grunge style to their music. In 1988 they debuted with an ep entitled Super Fuzz, Big Muff, and in 1989 a self-titled ep was released. In 1990 an lp entitled Boiled Beef & Rotting Teeth was produced, and their latest, Every Good Boy Deserves Fudge, is currently on WLOZ's play list.

Every Good Boy Deserves Fudge has a different sound to it than their prior albums. This new melodic sound blended with more harmonica and keyboard has led many of their faithful followers to believe they've sold out. Some think MUDHONEY has sacrificed their musical integrity by changing their style so drastically. This might be the reason for the rumors that they are breaking up after they finish their current tour. However, at this concert the "new sound" everyone is complaining about didn't stand out. They sounded like typical MUDHONEY.

When these six musical avengers (being my friends and I) got to the Cats Cradle, we waited outside in line on a rainy and chilly evening. When we were ready to purchase our passes into the musical world of MUDHONEY, the gatekeeper said the forbidden words, "Sold out!" Miffed does not begin to describe the feelings going through our lush heads. One of the avengers turned her "charm" on the band's manager, who just happened to pass by, and got a few tickets for a few promises ... I mean empty promises. The rest of us supported the "entrepreneurs" standing outside the door.

The show itself was quite a sight. They performed "In and Out of Grace," "Hate the Police" and "Torch me - I'm sick" with excellent grunge and a bit more purpose and control than prior MUDHONEY performances. There was abundant slammering from a benevolent crowd. My friends, who did a few stage dives and lots of heavy slammering, said their fellow moshers were relatively friendly and polite. However, one of my friends entered the chaser of bouncing bodies with his shirt on and returned with it on inside out! (He didn't understand it either.)

When the show was over, we left in a daze. We weren't sure if we had just witnessed one of the last performances of MUDHONEY or not, but one thing we did know was that it had been a "truly, lushly, excellent adventure."

The quest of six musically starved students had been completed.

Systems Support Engineers

A meeting you'll never forget.

Suddenly there you are.

Face to face with the opportunity of a lifetime...and the implications are enormous. You're a Systems Support Engineer for Microsoft. Providing imaginative solutions to systems problems. And it's only the beginning.

Here, you'll never butt heads with boredom. Because you'll be involved with real-time problem-solving from the minute you start. Interacting with third-party developers and writing sample code. With the full weight of an industry giant behind you.

In the course of your work you'll become an expert in a system such as MS-DOS®, LAN Manager, SQL Server, or Windows™ Software Development Kit, or an application such as Excel, Microsoft Word or Works. On-the-job training for a career as promising as the products themselves.

If you are pursuing a Bachelor's degree in Computer Science, Math, Electrical Engineering or a related discipline, we'd like to talk with you at our Company Presentation. If you've dreamed of making it big in the software industry, we can accommodate your ambition.

We are an equal opportunity employer and are working toward a more culturally diverse workplace.

SGA UPDATE

SPOTLIGHTS

Harold "Lee" Person, Sophomore Senator

Lee has served on SGA since last year when he held the position of freshman senator. This year, he is involved with the Budget and Planning Committee and the Constitution Committee. Because of new legislation, Lee feels that the senate has a better knowledge of the funding process of the SGA.

In the future, Lee hopes to involve the student body with the community hoping to improve the image of the SGA.

note:

Each week in The Seahawk, the Student Government buys one page to update the student body on all Student Government sponsored activities and events. The Public Affairs Committee is responsible for this publication and would like to take advantage of this space to recognize one member of the S.G.A. each week as well as one S.G.A. sponsored committee or organization.

Election Board Note:

The SGA fall elections are behind us, but not forgotten. I'd like to thank all the students who voted for the SGA fall elections. Without your help and support, there wouldn't be a Student Government Association. I feel this election was a complete success. I enjoyed working with each candidate and wish each and every one of them could have won, but that is the purpose behind an election. I feel they were all winners in their own way. I just hope that the newly elected officers, senate members, and representatives at large, work hard and represent their position well, and that the ones not elected get involved in other ways.

I look forward to working for the Student Body during this coming year. I welcome any ideas or suggestions you may have and extend an invitation to you to stop by the SGA office and meet with me.

Shasta McAllister
Election Board Chair

Orientation Committee

Committee Head: Barry W. Graham

Contact: Anyone interested in becoming involved with the Orientation Committee should leave a message in the SGA office or in the LEAD box in the Leadership Center.

The Orientation Committee has helped the Lead consultants plan the SGA retreat scheduled for Saturday September 28. The committee is also responsible for indoctrinating new senators and updating returning senators on any changes that have been made.

Goal: To orientate new senators to SGA procedures and to make them feel welcome.

DID YOU KNOW. . .

Each student pays $313 per semester to the Student Government, Postal Service, Health Services, and several other organizations. Here is a breakdown of exactly where and how your student fees are being spent.

Athletic Fee- $91.50 Fee provides support to intercollegiate athletics including personnel and supplies for all intercollegiate athletic teams.

Student University Operating Fee- $50.50 Funds the staff and operating costs of the University Union and University Center.

Health Services Fee- $49.00 Funds the health service contract and various activities related to health and wellness of the students at UNCW. Includes staff, facilities and operating costs.

Student Union Debt Services Fee- $45.00 Funds the debt incurred on the University Union and University Center.

PE Facilities Debt Services Fee- $25.00 Funds the debt service and operating costs of Trask Coliseum and adjoining Physical Education facilities.

Student Government Association- $19.00 Funds the operation of the Student Government Association including staff and allocations as approved by the Student Government Senate to various functions such as student newspaper, yearbook, various groups and organizations.

Physical Activities Support Fee- $18.00 Funds the staffing and supply needs of the University men's and women's basket rooms.

Intramural Fee- $6.00 Funds the campus intramural program including staff.

Cultural Events Fee- $5.00 Funds cultural activities such as speakers and the Summer Arts Festival as determined through the Provost's Office in concert with the Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences and the Department of Fine Arts.

Postal Service Fee- $4.00 Partial funding of the University Post Office operations, approximately 50/50 split between student fees and state appropriations.

consultations at the United Nations in which President Bush and other Western leaders groped for a way to persuade Iraq to comply with U.N. cease-fire resolutions short of another armed conflict.

There was some concern that a military threat against Iraq could escalate tensions and endanger the U.N. inspection team in Baghdad. Beyond that, there was undisguised puzzlement about what could be done to persuade Iraqi President Saddam Hussein to adhere to U.N. demands that Iraq's weaponry be dismantled.

Earlier Tuesday, Bush warned: "Saddam Hussein ought not to miscalculate."

At the Pentagon, spokesman Pete Williams said the military has been planning for the potential of further military action against Iraq for months, but declined to offer any details.

Pentagon officials said the United States soon will be sending more long-range attack planes to Turkey, where they could be used against Iraqi targets. But they also said military options, even combined with trade sanctions, aren't sufficient to halt Saddam's push for weapons of mass destruction.

"That's one of the reasons why these inspections are so important," Williams said.

The United States will increase the number of warplanes it has stationed in Turkey — now consisting of 79 helicopters and 42 fixed-wing planes — by some unspecified number, Williams said. While the aircraft are earmarked for protection of Iraq's rebellious Kurdish minority against attacks by Saddam's loyalists, Pentagon officials said they could be used for raids or escort missions into Iraq.

In addition to those forces at Turkey's Incirlik air base, the United States has about 200 other planes in the region, largely in Saudi Arabia and aboard two aircraft carriers. There are about 36,000 U.S. troops in the area, down from 541,000 during the war.

Some Navy ships in the region also are equipped with Tomahawk cruise missiles, which can hit targets from more than 500 miles away.

But none of those weapons could force Iraq to yield the documents the United Nations wants, defense officials said. "A series of punishing attacks might force (Saddam) to relent, but he already got through the war without turning any of that stuff over," a Navy official said.

In addition to considering attacks on weapons sites, defense officials have said that command and control centers are among the targets being looked at by U.S. military planners — a veiled threat to Saddam himself.

Last week, Bush made clear he was ready to dispatch more warplanes to the region to protect the U.N. inspectors as they surveyed Iraqi weapons sites, but Pentagon officials have detailed in recent days the shortcomings of military power in this situation.

While protecting the inspectors' helicopters is relatively simple, ensuring the inspectors' safety once they are on the ground is much more difficult, defense officials said.

Protecting the inspectors doesn't give us access to the Iraqi documents," one Air Force officer said. "Military force, alone, can't uncover them."

And every inspector is a potential hostage. Defense officials are mindful that Saddam held Westerners captive — some at weapons sites — for months after invading Kuwait last year.

Bush and Secretary of State James A. Baker III spent the months leading up to the Persian Gulf War putting together an unprecedented coalition of nations united in their opposition to Saddam's aggression in Kuwait.

The administration is keenly aware that any follow-up military action could be judged as overkill by some Third World nations or Arab neighbors of Iraq.

"You don't bomb the Iraqis just for the hell of it," said one State Department official, who spoke only if not identified by name.

That is one reason Bush and Baker are again consulting with allies at the United Nations, rounding up commitments for aggressive action if the need persists.

"The effort has been to make the U.N. process of inspections work," the same State Department official said. "It doesn't mean we have to react to every incident with military force."

"But if it comes down to flying our own helicopters, I think we're prepared to do that," he said.

Simpson argued that the Democratic strategy attempting to portray Bush as "cold, aloof, evil, uncaring about anything on the domestic front" will backfire.

"That's a good trick but it's not going to work," Simpson said, because of Bush's success at "bringing peace to the world, which I always thought was a pretty good thing domestically."

The $5.8 billion Democratic bill, paid for from a $8 billion in the unemployment trust fund, allocates benefits based on states' unemployment rates. The unemployed in Illinois would receive seven weeks of additional benefits.

The $2.4 billion GOP plan, to be offset by $3.1 billion raised by auctioning radio frequencies and improving student loan paybacks, would have resulted in six additional weeks of benefits in Illinois.

The House last week also voted by a veto-proof margin to extend benefits, and the two chambers will have to agree on a single version before a bill reaches Bush's desk.

The bill approved by the Senate would cover unemployed people who run out of benefits beginning Oct. 6. People who exhausted their 26 weeks of benefits since last April 1 would get extended aid if they are in states with high unemployment. The extended-benefits program would expire July 4.

Let's be blunt. If you're a man, you've got to register with Selective Service within a month of turning 18. If you don't, you're breaking the law.

Register with Selective Service. It's quick, it's free, and it's the law.

Unemployment Battle Turns Political

BY MITCHELL LOCIN
Chicago Tribune

WASHINGTON — While Congress fights over granting 20 weeks or 10 weeks of extra benefits to the unemployed, the real battle may be over Democrats' ability to cut into President Bush's overwhelming popularity.

"This has now turned into a point-scoring contest," said Senate Minority Whip Alan Simpson (R-Wyo.).

After seven weeks of a constant Democratic barrage, administration opposition to a maximum 20-week extension of jobless benefits has turned into a late-starting campaign on behalf of a GOP alternative calling for a maximum of 10 weeks of additional assistance. Unemployment benefits now run out after 26 weeks.

The GOP alternative was rejected Tuesday night by the Senate's Democratic majority, 57-42. The Senate then voted for the Democratic plan, 69-30, with 13 Republicans voting against the president. The winning margin is enough to override a threatened presidential veto.

There is no sign that public support for the president is wavering, but the White House nonetheless has mounted a campaign to demonstrate its concern for the 300,000 jobless workers a month who exhaust their regular unemployment benefits.

On Monday, Bush brushed off reporters' questions about Iraq and instead emphasized that he has been on the telephone working on the Republican plan for jobless aid, sponsored by Senate Minority Leader Robert Dole (R-Kan.).

"We strongly support Bob Dole's package, which is budgetarily sound, forward looking, takes care of those that really need help," Bush said.

The president spoke out on the issue after a number of Republicans, some up for reelection next year in states hurting from high unemployment, said they could not oppose the Democratic plan without having an alternative to support.

In their talks with senators, Bush and other administration figures asked the members to stick with him even if he has to again kill the Democratic plan.

John Sununu, Bush's chief of staff, met with the GOP members over lunch while Labor Secretary Lynn Martin and Budget Director Richard Darman took to the airwaves promoting the president's position.

The aggressive effort contrasts with the Republican strategy at the end of July when Democrats started pressing for legislation to help workers hardest hit by the recession.

There was a quiet, last-minute GOP effort then to offer the Dole alternative, but no White House rhetoric to back it up because its main contention then was that extended benefits would be a drag on the recovery.

The last time Bush talked about jobless legislation, he was on vacation in Maine when he killed a bill nearly identical to the one passed Tuesday. Though he signed the measure, he refused to declare that an economic emergency existed, a statement required to add spending beyond the ceilings imposed by the last autumn's budget agreement.

The White House said the legislation was not needed because "the recession has ended and ... a recovery appears to be under way."

Since then, in a rare display of a coordinated attack, Democrats for party Chairman Ron Brown to the newly declared presidential candidates to members of Congress have assailed Bush.

Democrat after Democrat has made speeches in their states and in the House and Senate decrying Bush's refusal to declare a budget "emergency" for the unemployed at home while helping the economically depressed abroad.

"Each month, Americans face the choice of paying bills or putting food on the table," said Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell (D-Maine). "That's an American emergency, Mr. President, and it does not involve people in other countries."

Environmental Notes...

BY ROSS GELBSPAN
Boston Globe

The Environmental Protection Agency is arguing against a national effort to encourage recycling.

Last week, EPA Administrator William K. Reilly told a Senate subcommittee that the administration could not support a proposed overhaul of the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act, the country's basic policies regulating waste disposal.

The bill would involve the federal government in creating markets for recyclable materials — plastics, paper and glass — collected by municipalities. For example, the bill calls for the paper industry to recover and reuse 40 percent of all paper consumed in the United States by 1995. It would set a 25 percent requirement for plastics by the same year and a standard of 65 percent for glass containers by 2005.

In addition, the bill seeks reductions in industrial uses of toxic substances by asking companies to set their own goals.

While many environmentalists call the bill's goals too conservative, Reilly told the Senate Public Works and the Environment Subcommittee on Environmental Protection that the bill could generate "extraordinary" costs to business. He added that the administration opposed "nationalizing" the trash problem.

Scientists continue to chronicle the bleaching of underwater coral reefs as new research points to increasingly strong correlations between the bleaching and subtle but distinct increases in ocean temperatures that some have attributed to global warming.

Dr. Ernest Williams, a marine scientist at the University of Puerto Rico, said in a telephone interview that researchers had discovered new bleaching recently in reefs off Thailand, as well as off a group of islands south of Japan. Williams added that within the past several weeks, he had received similar reports from Okinawa, Samoa, Belize, the Cayman Islands and the Florida Keys.

Williams noted that at a recent conference, researchers from the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the Environmental Protection Agency and the National Science Foundation agreed that very small increases in water temperature correlated with the spreading phenomenon.

The bleaching follows the expulsion by the coral of algae that live inside the reefs. While Williams said some reefs recovered from bleaching, he added that researchers had already found several dead parts of reef.

What do students from Mount Holyoke College, James Madison University, California Polytechnic University and the University of Chicago have in common?

They are all cited for helping to protect the environment in a new book called "The Student Environmental Action Guide: 25 Simple Things We Can Do."

The book, which was published earlier this month by Earth Works in Berkeley, Calif., lists 25 activities, most involving little or no cost, devised by student environmentalists to reduce the burden on their immediate environment.

At Mount Holyoke in South Hadley, Mass., for instance, a three-month energy-saving competition among dormitories saved the school $4,500 and reduced energy consumption by 43,246 kilowatt hours.

At James Madison in Harrisonburg, Va., 7,500 of the school's 10,000 students bought ceramic mugs to reduce the use of paper or styrofoam cups. Now, the school issues a mug to every incoming freshman.

At California Polytechnic, students established an aluminum can recycling center. The response of other students soon overwhelmed the original recycling storage facility. As a result, students now have 59 collection locations on campus.

Donald Trump, his Marla Maples engagement just a blur in his rear-view mirror, was busy test-driving a new model around the Big Apple a day after the breakup. She's 21-year-old Kim Alley, a model who hails from Richmond, Va. They met at a Manhattan bash Friday night and ended up taking the party on the road into the wee hours in Trump's chauffeur-driven limo. Alley told the New York Daily News that The Donald is "very funny," "a very good dancer" and "a good kisser." And, she says, "He's a lot sexier in person than he is in all those pictures." Which explains a lot.

You could just say you're waiting for the movie. But for those who must appear up on the literary world's latest next big thing, M. Now anybody — not just those who actually bother to read it — can keep a hand in the conversation when talk turns to the tome and its tales of CIA cloak-and-dagger.

"It seems to me like the autobiography of the life Mailer wished he'd lived."

"The narrator's a tough guy. And guess what? He doesn't dance."

"It reads like a cross between Robert Ludlum and Nietzsche."

The dimpled Nashville heartthrob, 29, will bring his lady friend, 34, to the Country Music Association Awards show Oct. 2, where Black will team up with legendary singing cowboy Roy Rogers, 79, on "Hold On Partner." President Bush plans to take in the show.

Veteran soap star Macdonald Carey, who plays Dr. Tom Horton on "Days of Our Lives," is out of intensive care and remains in stable condition at a Santa Monica, Calif., hospital. The 78-year-old actor had lung cancer surgery last Wednesday.

Move Over Greg Lemond, Here I Come

Excuse me this week, if I grimace and whimper through this column. You will have to forgive me. I'm still trying to recover from my trip to the beach.

"The beach?" you say. "What's so hard about driving down Wrightsville Avenue for 15 minutes, 8.5 if you speed?"

"Nothing," I would reply. "Except I didn't drive, I rode my bike. And the beach wasn't Wrightsville or even mercifully Carolina; it was Sunset, and it was 170 miles away." I should explain.

Ever since I watched the Tour De France three years ago, I've had an intense desire to compete and race bicycles. Through the years I have developed this interest in the sport into a passion, spending countless hours babying my trusty two-wheeler with a soft i.e. I've upgraded my friend, with new high-tech equipment, repaired loose parts, and of course kept it out of the wind, rain, snow, and my father's car if at all possible.

You see, I take my sport seriously. However, despite my zeal to learn and do everything associated with cycling, I admit I haven't entered too many biking events. Time has been a major obstacle. I never seem to have enough of it.

However, whenever I'm at my favorite bike shop, I tend to pick up the latest cycling brochures on upcoming contests. It is here where Sunset Beach and 150 miles come into the picture.

The event was, "Breakaway to the Beach," a bike journey from Fayetteville, N.C. to Sunset Beach, S.C. in two days.

It would be my first test of my cycling career. I was prepared. After all I had eaten the right foods, gone on long two-hour 60 mile bike rides, and I raised the necessary $150 in pledges to ride in the race. The proceeds go to benefit multiple sclerosis research centers. I was all set.

Or at least I thought I was!

DAY 1: 87 miles
6:30 a.m.—Fayetteville, N.C.— Turn off set alarm that would have prevented me for rushing for my 8:30 a.m. start time.

8:10 a.m.— Yes, I'm late. Kill three birds, two squirrels, and an object resembling a snake on the way. But, hey I made it on time.

8:27 a.m.— Registered, luggage taken care off, number on my outfit; now where did I leave that bike?

9:15 a.m.—Feel good, feel all right, cruising ahead of the pack.

9:16 a.m.— 22 miles complete. Gee! I hope the police escort ahead of me knows where he is going. I don't. I'm following him.

11:00 a.m.—Head wind, head wind, head wind, 33 miles completed.

11:01 a.m.— Dog alert #1. Large Doberman tries to eat front tire.

11:02 a.m.—Dog #2

11:03 a.m.—Dog #3

11:04 a.m.—Dog #4, #5, #6, and #7. Yes, we did pedal fast to get away.

11:05 a.m.—You guessed it, Dog #8. Did the race promoters give these canines the map of the course. Shesh!!

11:45 a.m.—45 miles down!! Hit rest stop four, load-up on bananas, apples, and a sticky pink substance called 10-K.

12:25 p.m.— 65 miles down. Sick of eating bananas, apples, and drinking 10-K. I want a Big Mac!!!

1:30 p.m.— 75 miles down. For 10 bucks and a ride in your car, you can have my bike, cleated shoes, cyclometer, water bottles, jersey, and anything else you desire.

1:50 p.m.— 80 miles completed. You say Dillon (half-way point) is only seven miles away, but do you have to ride it? Arrrrrr!!

Day 2: 75 miles

8:00 a.m.— Start stage two, 650 more cyclist join us from Charlotte. Can you say crowded?

10:00 a.m.—27 miles down. My butt is asleep. My hands are numb. But hey, I'm having fun!

11:00 a.m.— Fall off bike on glutes maximum (my butt) at rest stop. NO, I'M NOT A HAPPY CAMPER. 38 miles down.

11:30 a.m.— If I eat one more stupid banana, I'm going to turn into a monkey.

12:00 p.m.— A voice says, "If you blow past this rest stop, you'll get to the end faster." 54 miles down.

12:20 p.m.—Water, water, water.... (Last time I listen to that voice!)

1:30 p.m.— Does anyone know a good acupuncture?? 66 miles down.

2:05 p.m.— I made it, I made it. Now where the hell am I??!

So what did I learn after 162 miles of pain and anguish. The whole event was worth doing. I do it again... even if my butt hurts after it.

Seahawks Fall to 'Heels, 13-9

BY DAVE BARNHARDT
Seahawk Sportswriter

Turnovers and missed opportunities hindered a strong UNCW bid for a second half comeback, as the Seahawks fell 13-9 to the junior varsity UNC Tar Heels Sept. 22 at the residential activity field.

The Tar Heels (1-0) jumped out to an early 7-0 first quarter advantage on a three-yard quarterback sneak up the middle. The touchdown was set up by a Tar Heel fumble recovery at the Seahawk 30 yard-line.

UNC struck quickly again on a 70-yard drive capped by a 15-yard touchdown toss. The Tar Heels tried to tack on a two-point conversion, but their fake extra point kick failed, leaving the score at 13-0 at the end of the quarter.

The second quarter was filled with turnovers as defense stiffened.

Both teams had drives which ended in interceptions. The Seahawks had two interceptions in the quarter the most costly one at the Carolina 10-yard line as the Seahawks were threaten to score.

Defensive play was again the key for both squads in the second half. The Seahawks held the Tar Heel offense scoreless the entire 45 minutes, forcing Carolina to punt all five possessions. The Tar Heels defense, meanwhile, was scrambling in its effort to hold the Seahawks out of the end zone.

"We stuck together in the second half," said team captain Kasey Jack. "We played with more determination."

The Seahawks threatened again on their first possession of the third quarter moving the ball down the field with short passes and strong power runs. With a first and goal, the Seahawks were perched inside the five-yard line. However, UNCW hurt themselves again, fumbling the ball on Carolina's 2 yard line.

The Seahawks finally got on the scoreboard,

A Seahawk running back tries to make an extra yard on a carry last year against Carolina. The Tar Heels defeated UNCW again on Brooks Field in a close 13-9 affair that featured numerous turnovers and tough defensive plays.

when strong safety Andy Todd capitalized on the Tar Heels' bad field possession and sacked the Tar Heels' quarterback in the end zone for a safety, putting the score at 13-2 going into the final quarter.

The Seahawks came out smoking. UNCW scored on a 45-yard half-back option bomb to wide-out Hal Turnage. The score cut the Carolina lead to 13-9. The Tar Heels defense then tightened shutting down the UNCW attack. The Seahawks did have one last opportunity to win the game. UNCW was inside the Tar Heel 30-yard line in the final minute of regulation, but again was turned away by a Tar Heel interception.

UNCW Downs VCU For Fourth Win

BY STEVE McDANIEL
Seahawk Sportswriter

After playing the likes of Duke and North Carolina, the UNCW volleyball team wasn't ready for the kind of game they got from Virginia Commonwealth, Sept. 21 at Hanover Hall.

The Lady Seahawks, trying to adjust from the power game that their Atlantic Coast Conference opponents (Duke,UNC) had used in previous matches, took four games to beat VCU, 16-14, 13-15, 15-8, 15-8.

The smaller VCU team hit deep corner shots and short dinks over the net to try to offset UNCW's size advantage. And the strategy worked for a while, as they stayed close to the bigger Seahawks for the first two games. After that, UNCW's size and experience took over.

"Their different game plan gave us some trouble at first," coach Kathy McDaniel said. "We had to adjust our strategy to compensate. We started setting the ball quicker and lower and concentrated on strong serves."

Team co-captain Kim Cavanaugh, was once again a major factor in the victory, despite playing with an ailing knee. She nailed 16 kills and blocked nine shots at the net.

Sheldn Plensovich had 35 assists and 11 digs, and registered half of her shots as kills. Jen Parks contributed five service aces.

"We played well as a team on Saturday," Cavanaugh said. "Our intensity level was up and we didn't have any lapses in concentration, like we had in some of our earlier matches."

She added, "VCU made a lot of mistakes on some of their hits and on defense. We were able to block their shots at the net and they had trouble getting to many of our shots."

Co-captain Julie Shouse, the defensive anchor for the Seahawks, said of Saturday's match, "We had fun playing and our intensity was really strong."

"We thrive on emotion," she added, "and I try to help spark the team when I come in. I hope it (Saturday's match) predicts how we'll do the rest of the season."

Outside hitter Lesli Knauss, who is also playing with pain caused by chronic ankle problems, agreed that the match was one of the team's best this season.

"We made some mistakes early, but we didn't let it get us down," she said. "Adjusting to their style of play with the deep shots and dinks was the hardest, but once we figured out what they were trying to do, we were able to take control."

Senior volleyball player Lesli Knauss reaches out to block a Carolina spiker in the Seahawk game against UNC. UNCW defeated Virginia Commonwealth Saturday, 16-14, 13-15, 15-8, 15-8.

Sports Briefs... Booters Snag Win No. 1

Seahawks Get First Win

The UNCW men's soccer team captured their first win of the season as they split away weekend Colonial Conference matches.

The Seahawks (1-3-1) dropped a Friday night contest to first-year conference member, Old Dominion, 5-1. ODU outshot the Seahawks 21-7. Paul Cairney scored the lone Seahawk goal with an assist from freshman Greg LaMendola.

Junior Chris Parks scored the game winning goal on Sunday, Sept. 22 with an assist from senior Gerard Schwenk. Seahawk goalie Tom Redmond stopped seven shots in the contest recording his first shutout of the season. UNCW however was outshot again by their opponents, 15-3.

The Seahawks face arch rival East Carolina at home Saturday, Sept. 28.

Featured Match At Fling

North Carolina sectional rivals UNCW Seamen and Burning Ring of Fire go at each other in exhibition ultimate frisbee play Sept. 28 at 5 p.m. on Brooks Field. The Seamen are again ranked in the top five in the nation in their sport. The featured match-up is a new addition to the host Seahawks' tournament,

"The Fall Fling."

Sixteen ultimate teams are tentatively scheduled for the two day frisbee tournament that begins at 8 a.m. Saturday Sept. 28, and concludes at 5 p.m. Sunday. Teams participating include squads from Blue Ridge, Virginia to Charlotte.

Bobbitt Paces Harriers

Trekkers Sam Bobbitt and junior Amy Jackson led both the UNCW men and women's cross country teams to a seventh place finishes at the Tar Heel Invitational on the Finley Golf course Saturday, Sept. 21. Wake Forest took the male eight team competition while North Carolina State won the women twelve team contest. The meet was the second competition for the Seahawk harriers.

Bobbitt, the top UNCW male finisher, shaved 30 seconds off his best time for the event, finishing the five mile course in 25 minutes and 16 seconds. Senior Shawn Brinson finished in 31st place (25:39), followed by freshman Tim Cox (51st, 26:39), sophomore Kristian Agnew (56th, 26:49), senior Larry Jackson (83rd, 28:12), junior Jared Haag (84th, 28:15), and freshman Dan Miller (89th, 28:37).

Jackson covered the 3.1 mile in 18:07 to register a 12th place showing for the Lady Seahawks. Other UNCW women finishers included: senior Kris Scott (20th, 18:27), freshman Heather Fenton (43rd, 19:19), freshman Michelle Melton (49th, 19:40), sophomore Jill Peeples (54th, 19:48), Lalonnis Walker (60th, 19:56).

The Seahawks' next meet is in Charlotte for the Charlotte Invitational, Oct. 3.

Golfers Battle Back

The UNCW Seahawk men's golf team used strong second day rounds to recover from a dismal first day outing for a second place finish (300-301-601) at the Francis Marion Invitational Golf Tournament in Florence, S.C. Sept. 21st-22nd. The Citadel won the tournament with a team total of 312-298-610.

UNCW shot a first day, 35 strokes over par. "We didn't get the numbers I was hoping for the first day," head coach Chris Lane said. "Our veterans let us down the first day."

Both Craker and Spah shot a two-over par, 75, on Sunday. Junior Hugh Harrel added at par round. UNCW next meet is at the Tom O'Brian Memorial Tournament, in Greensboro, N.C. Oct. 7.

Two Years Away

Minors To Be Available At UNCW

Editor's Note: Parts of this story were run in last week's Seahawk. Here is the story in its entirety. We apologize for any inconvenience we may have caused.

BY LAURA KEETER
Staff Writer

In probably two years, a minor at UNCW will be offered to undergraduates. Chancellor James R. Leutze has endorsed the resolution passed by the Faculty Senate to adopt a minor curriculum. The Faculty Senate resolution proposes definitions for majors and minors.

A minor is defined as "an approved course of study designed to provide students with an overview of the essential knowledge and methods of a subject and with a sample of its depth. A minor must consist of at least 18, but not more than 24, semester hours of credit, at least six of which are at the 300-400 level."

Under the resolution, minors are optional for students. They are also optional for departments, which can choose whether or not to offer a minor or minors.

"The University Curriculum

'It was the consensus of the committee that students who wish to have a mini-concentration have their efforts recognized.'

Committee designed the minor and wrote the policy that would allow minors," said Dr. Kenneth Spackman, who was Chair-person of the committee last year.

"It was the consensus of the committee that students who wish to have a mini-concentration have their efforts recognized," said Spackman.

The policy only applies to undergraduates for the bachelor degree said Spackman. "If a student would like, he can use some of the room in the 124 hours to choose a minor among the electives," Spackman said.

Minors won't consist of several classes that a student puts together, but it would be a structured set of courses, Spackman said. It is envisioned that instead of a student choosing a smorgasbord of courses that a department offers, minors will define the courses that will be taken, said Spackman.

Sharon Williams, a pre-nursing major, said, "I would love to have a business minor to go along with my nursing major in case I decided to go into nursing administration to further my career."

To further broaden curriculum horizons, minors can be "interdisciplinary," which means two departments can get together and offer a combined minor, Spackman said. This would be the case if departments see an overlapping interest. A concentration, such as psychology and biology or sociology and anthropology would be possible.

The stages the proposed minor went through began last November with its development in the University Curriculum Committee. They then submitted a recommendation to the Faculty Senate, which amended and passed the recommendation in April. It then awaited an administration action. Academic Affairs was in support of the resolution. The final stage was the approval of Chancellor Leutze, which came in a memorandum Sept. 5.

Racism Discussed By NAACP

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

Some of the topics discussed at the NAACP meeting Tuesday were Clarence Thomas, labelling of blacks, relationships involving black women and interracial prejudice. It was the first meeting of the year for the organization.

The group re-formed when a need was seen for a group to serve the minority population on campus, said Ken Lemon.

Lemon said he felt an organization like this was missing and decided to re-form it. "With the percentage of minority students down, they need an outlet for social and educational purposes to get involved in. With the projects and activities, more minorities will come and more will stay."

Lemon said that the one-hour meeting had the potential to go longer than it did when issues were raised, activities were discussed and topics were formulated for further discussion at future meetings.

'The group re-formed when a need was seen for a group to serve the minority population...'

Some of the activities in the works for the club are a possible study of black writers and literature through the formation of a book club. To supplement the book club, there will be a writing club.

Approximately 35 people attended the meeting. Lemon said it was an excellent turnout. "It was a shock. A lot of people came out and were supportive. We were anticipating about 15 since the advertising was scarce. It was mostly word of mouth. We were also up against the gospel choir. That's the largest minority organization and they had an engagement at 7:00, the time of our meeting."

Lemon said there are no long term goals of the organization yet. He added that he wants it to "heavily" serve the university community. He also says he hopes the membership of the organization will represent a good cross-section of the university community but he wants a good response from the freshman in order for the organization to survive. "The heavier, the better," he said.

The next NAACP meeting will be on Tuesday at 7:00 p.m. at the Hawk's Nest Study Room in the University Union. At this meeting, officers will be elected. All interested parties are invited to attend.

Search For A New Provost Is On

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

The search for a new provost is on. A search committee has been formed to fill the position that Dr. Charles Cahill, the present provost, is filling until a successor can be found.

The position of provost involves the planning and administering of the budget for academic affairs, implementation of academic programs and faculty recruitment. As well as these duties, a provost must work with the chancellor, vice chancellors, the deans' council and members of support areas, such as Library Services, Enrollment Management, and Intercollegiate Athletics. Dr. Daniel Plyler, chairman of the committee, said the position covers the gamut in terms of academics. "It involves articulating and implementing the academic mission of the university," Plyler said.

The provost's role in student affairs is the development of programs and classes. It is the responsibility of the provost to make sure there is space for the class and faculty to teach it. The provost also is responsible for the formulation of new areas and departments within the university.

The first phase of the process was to draw up a document: advertising the position. Plyler said the advertisement had run twice and would run twice more in the Chronicle of Higher Education. Requirements stated in this ad ask that the candidate have a doctorate degree and sufficient academic credentials, as well as experience in academic administration, effective communication skills, and dynamic leadership. The applications, due October 31, must include a letter of application and references.

The next step in the process is to review the applications and to intensify the search. A number of the applicants will be invited to the university, then the search will intensify yet again. The search committee will nominate three candidates for the position, as recommended by Chancellor James Leutze. After that the candidates will probably be brought back to the campus for another intensive session, Plyler said.

When the position is filled, the new provost will begin July 1.

Riverfest This Weekend

BY BETH CAPPS
Staff Writer

This weekend, Wilmington will kick off its annual Riverfest celebration on the Cape Fear riverfront. This year, new activities and entertainment have been planned.

A Marine Expo will kick off the festivities on Thursday. Friday will hold a photography exhibition, maritime trade show and the carving of railroad crossbars by James Penny. Saturday's events include a softball tournament, ship tours on Water Street, the Riverfest Regatta, a Front Street bazaar, boat shows, gymnastics and martial arts demonstrations, a shag contest, a paddleboat race and fireworks. Sunday will begin with the "Run the River" race. All who are interested in running should register at 7 a.m. Sunday. The festivities will continue with a clogging competition, dart tournament and open house at the North Carolina Ports Authority.

Several musical performances will be given over the weekend. Scheduled to perform Saturday are King Ink, an alternative music trio from Wilmington; Joann's Orchestre, an instrumental jazz trio with a hula dancer; Psalms, a Wilmington-based jazz combo; Rude Dogs, a classic rock band; and the Spontanes, a band of various music styles ranging from country to rock. Scheduled to perform Sunday are Blue Rhythm Club, a blues combo; Eve Cornelius, a jazz vocalist; and Mighty Majors, an eight member band that plays a variety of soul, funk, oriental, Top 40 and beach music.

Children's events are also scheduled. These include a magic show, juggling, mime and folk songs on Saturday with stilt-walkers and storytellers on Sunday.

Riverfest coincides with UNCW's family weekend, a weekend set aside for UNCW students to get together with family members and participate in fun activities.

Former SGA Member

Best To Run For City Council

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor In Chief

Denny Best is looking to put some of his experience at UNCW to work in Wilmington city government.

Best, who spent three of his years at UNCW in the Student Government Association (SGA) senate, is running in the Oct. 8 race for Wilmington City Council.

He is running as an independent, but says he considers himself a liberal and a socialist.

"I see a lot that can be done in the community," said Best. He includes in his campaign materials a flyer stating his positions on student-oriented issues.

"As students we contribute greatly to the local community, especially to its economy," the paper states. "The locals love our money but dislike us as students."

Best said he would support city legislation which would give students more consideration in the community.

The position paper stated that Best supported repealing a Wilmington ordinance forbidding more than three unrelated persons from living in a single home.

The ordinance was aimed at preventing students from living in Wilmington neighborhoods, he said. "This... has in the past been used against other groups: blacks, Jews, Hispanics, gays, etc. All of this smacks of discrimination against students."

Best said he would also work to implement change in local noise ordinances. He said that under his program, "Police cannot break up or even warn students about a party or gathering they are having unless such a gathering is in excess of a set amount of sound. This will stop police from harassing students because those students have a neighbor who complains about the smallest of noise."

Best said he would also request that a "member of the university community" be on each city commission and board. "This will help to make sure the interests of students and the university are protected," he said.

In other community issues, Best said he focuses on the plight of the poor. "People complain about the welfare system but very rarely do they come up with alternatives to the welfare system," he said.

Best said he plans to implement programs to increase the number of police officers on foot patrol, begin a neighborhood daycare program, and strictly enforce codes to eliminate substandard housing.

Best is one of 12 candidates running for three positions, but he says he is confident that he will win.

"I've got a strong voter base. There's a good size liberal element that will come out and vote for me..." he said.

Age-old Myths Discussed

BY JENNIFER WILSON
Staff Writer

Author May Sarton once said that old age is a foreign country. UNCW professors Dr. Eleanor Maxwell and Dr. Barbara Waxman say that, just as traveling to a foreign country requires a prepared journey, so does growing old.

This preparation needs to be done by each individual and also by American society, which believes many negative myths about aging.

Maxwell, associate professor of sociology, has authored "Fading Out: Resource Control and Cross Cultural Patterns of Deference," an article published in the Journal of Cross Cultural Gerontology. Waxman, an associate professor of English, wrote From the Hearth to the Open Road: A Feminist Study of Aging in Contemporary Literature.

Maxwell and Waxman are attempting to explode common myths including "there is one way to age successfully," "old people are infirm and dependent," and "old age should be a mellowing out time."

Three ways the professors are hoping to show the positive side to aging are teaching in an interdisciplinary course called Literature of Sociology and Aging, trying to make gerontology, the study of old age, a minor at UNCW, and by participating in a live, interactive telecast called "Exploding the Myths of Aging," this afternoon.

The trial course, Literature of Sociology and Aging, is being taught by both professors for the first time this semester. It combines a sociology text on the life course with novels and autobiographical texts in exploring how aging alters the dynamics of family and social relationships. It is an experimental course which still needs to be approved by the College of Arts and Sciences Curriculum Committee.

Once approved, it will become one of the elective courses in the gerontology minor. Other electives will include: Programs and Policies for Older Adults, Sociology of Birth and Death, Therapeutic Recreation for the Aging, and Bio-ethics: Sociology of Aging, Psychology of Adulthood and Aging, and a choice of either Health and Aging or Biography of Aging will be the three required courses. A one to four hour practicum will also be required.

A planning committee chaired by Maxwell has lined up the curriculum for the gerontology minor. The minor conforms to suggestions by the Association for Gerontology in Higher Education, a national organization which makes guidelines for minors in this field.

Maxwell and Waxman will join Phyllis Diller, actress and author of The Joys of Aging and How to Avoid Them, at Southeastern Community College today in Room S 105 from 2:30 - 5:00 p.m. in the telecast of "Exploding the Myths of Aging."

This live telecast will also include Monsignor Charles Fahey, director of Fordham University's Third Age Center and Dr. Howard Chudacoff, professor of history at Brown University, author of How Old Are You?

Dr. Carole Haber, associate professor of history at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte, author of Beyond 65, will also be there to help make people aware that the aging population can be a vigorous and vital part of society. Doug Mayes, member of North Carolina Broadcaster's "Hall of Fame," will be the moderator of the telecast.

Maxwell and Waxman will present examples from fiction and statistics to disprove some of the myths about aging and they will also deal with gender and racial issues in aging.

Waxman feels that there is more than one way to rid society of the common misconceptions. "Through literature we can change the social beliefs. Literature shapes people's attitudes. It reflects and creates society."

Maxwell says, "Spend time with older people. Almost everyone who holds the myths has experiences that contradict them. They think their experiences are unique, but they're actually typical."

There is no fee to participate in the telecast. For more information, call 343-0481.

TELECONFERENCES OFFERED

Cape Fear Community College will be offering two FREE teleconferences for the public in October. The first Early Cardiac Care will be presented on Tuesday, October 15 from 3-4:30 p.m. The second Tech Prep: Developing Cooperative Programs and Partnerships will be broadcast on Tuesday, October 29 from 1-3:30 p.m. Both teleconferences may be viewed from the CFCC Teleconference Center in Room S-501.

Every year, heart attacks kill 600,000 Americans. Half of these deaths could be prevented. This teleconference, Early Cardiac Care will help participants learn a common sense approach to reducing heart attacks.

The Tech Prep teleconference is designed to inform participants on the federal guidelines and to describe the elements needed to have a successful program. There will also be a segment of this teleconference on the role of business/industry in developing partnerships. Royce N. Angel, Operations Manager, Southern Bell Telephone Company, Wilmington, NC, will be on hand at Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University in Blacksburg, Virginia to describe this role, as the teleconference is broadcast across the nation.

For additional information on either teleconference, please call CFCC 343-0481, ext. 253.

S.N.C.A.E.

The S.N.C.A.E. will conduct a media workshop on Tuesday, October 8, from 4-5 p.m. in the audio-visual room (King Hall). Dr. Earle will be conducting the workshop. Anyone interested may sign up in King Hall at the S.N.C.A.E. bulletin board.

Students "Give It Their Best Shot" With Mace Defense

BY LAURA KEETER
Staff Writer

"Just aim, spray and walk away," say the directions on a package of mace. The usual "Give it your best shot" from departing parents on the first day of college took on a whole new meaning this year. Many students are arming themselves with mace this year.

The one percent phenylchloromethylketone weapon costs $12.95 and is bought by a multi-sorted customer range, said Caroline Autry of Jim's Pawn and Guns. "Women buy it, men buy it for their wives, girlfriends, and people who walk buy it (for both human and canine attackers)," said Autry. Jim's Pawn and Guns sells about 72 mace guns a month.

"It's mainly parents buying it for their college student," said sales clerk Althea Orrell of Canada's Sport Center of 3220 Wrightsville Ave.

Although most people agree that accuracy is not essential and shoot for the eyes, any contact in the upper torso can be effective. The effects of mace are irritation of eyes, skin, and respiratory areas. The effects wear off after 20 minutes.

Mace causes no permanent damage. According to the packaging, mace should be washed out of the eyes with water and off the skin with soap and water. Campus Police's Crime Prevention Officer Hunter Davis said, "Pay attention to the wind. Are you going to get more on yourself?"

Students are carrying mace for protection and security. "The main reason I got it is because the apartment complex I live in has had several break-ins and attacks. And also the rapes at UNCW have caused me to be more cautious," said Jennifer Tew, a junior at UNCW.

Junior Kim Smith was given mace by her boyfriend "for protection." Freshman Sonya Stevenson says of her walks at night, "I keep my finger on the little red button. I aim it at everybody who walks by." Her mace was a gift from her boyfriend who she says, "didn't want me to walk around unprotected after he heard about the rapes (that occurred earlier this year on campus)."

Freshman Seminar Offered

BY BRENDA BURNELL
Staff Writer

Graduating from high school is a very important milestone in one's life, and starting college is an even greater one. But sometimes, students aren't as skillfully prepared as they may think. Fortunately, there is a class to help students become better acquainted with the university. At UNCW, there is a freshman seminar class that is offered as an elective. It is worth three semester hours and it is not required, but is encouraged.

The Freshman seminar class objectives include: improving college level skills, informing new students to the services available to them on campus, as well as encouraging them to participate in campus and community events.

"We are hoping to expand the number of sections, so that more students will be able to elect this course."

This is the first semester the class is being offered as an elective, said Dr. John Stokes, director of General College Advising. The class was first offered as a special course that was started for special students to help them improve their study skills and have a better opportunity for success at UNCW. It was later changed to an elective after a national study showed that students who take this class improved their grades.

Besides the course objective, students will participate in special activities on campus and within the community. Students living on campus are required to see dramatic presentations, musical performances, a lecture series, and LiveWell Alternatives Programs as well as receiving tutoring services at the Writing Place. Some community activities might include visiting Thalian Hall for a dramatic presentation, St. John's Museum, or viewing a movie at the New Hanover Library. Visually, the instructor will tell the students what to see or give them a choice and let them make the decision for themselves.

So far, UNCW offers seven sections with 22 students per section. Dr. Stokes said, "We are hoping to expand the number of sections, so that more students will be able to elect this course."

Chalmers Named Special Senator

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

"I feel like Miss America!"

That was the reaction Ivy Chalmers had to being named as Special Senator to the Student Government Association.

Chalmers, a non-traditional student, is a sophomore majoring in English. She said that she is very interested in drama and business as well. Chalmers said she "wants to send a message to other non-traditional students to get involved."

Chalmers found out about the position from meeting Student Body President Curtis Wilson. She came to a non-traditional students get-together at the beginning of the year. There she expressed interest in getting involved in student government.

Chalmers said she knew she wanted to be involved in SGA since before she transferred from Cape Fear Community College. She was involved in student government in high school and wanted to continue this in college.

Before her appointment to the senate, Chalmers attended three meetings of the SGA. At the fourth meeting, she was nominated against Denny Best.

Best, an unclassified student has returned to finish his studies. Best has had previous experience within SGA and the Campus Awareness Organization.

Chalmers knew Best was up against her and was afraid she might not get the position. When she did, she said she "felt great. This put things in perspective."

Chalmers plans to "orientate" herself with SGA this semester but plans to adopt a "pet project" next semester, which may be involving on-campus day care. "I plan to take this one step at a time and do the best job I can," she said.

Bike Auction To Be Held Oct. 19

BY VONDA HONEYCUTT
Staff Writer

Are you tired of staggering your way to classes by foot? If so, join other walkers for the third annual bicycle auction by the Campus Police on Saturday, October 19 from 9:00 a.m. until all the items are sold.

The sale will include bicycles and other property lost or left on campus during the previous year. The site for this event will be at the rear of the Campus Police building, off Price Road at the back of campus. The viewing of the merchandise will be held from

"It's a very good opportunity to get a bicycle."

7:00 to 9:00 a.m., right before the auction.

Many bicycles are left on campus at the end of the spring semester. Students have a week to 10 days to claim the bicycles. After six months of not being claimed, state law mandates that the bicycles must be picked up by the Campus Police and stored until the fall.

Storage for these bicycles is limited and every fall all bicycles must be moved. This is the major purpose for the sale.

Lieutenant Charlie Willis encourages all students to come to the sale, which in the past has been very successful. Willis says, "It's a good opportunity to get a bicycle." Almost every bicycle is sold, with all proceeds going to the New Hanover County School Board.

To claim a missing bicycle or any other item from the previous year, one must stop by the office before the day of the sale. Proof of ownership, serial number or bill of sale must be provided.

Consumers Can Stop Oil Drilling

There are some issues out there which seem so obviously one-sided that they are difficult to argue. One of those issues involves conservation and protection of the environment. Hearings began this week in Morehead City and Nags Head concerning oil drilling in the ocean waters off of the coast of North Carolina and other eastern states.

There should be no drilling in these areas. Given the relative benefits and hazards, there really isn't a need for it.

Even considering the best estimates of oil companies, the amount of energy value in the area is minute compared to the gains from some very simple widespread energy conservation. This conserving energy, in many cases, simply means using existing technology.

If consumers would just begin now to replace old burned-out light bulbs with high-density fluorescent bulbs, the energy they save would triple the energy expected to be utilized from oil off of the coast.

The same holds true for the manufacturing of automobiles with greater gas mileage. If the companies in Detroit would adopt the recently-proposed auto efficiency standards, the savings would outweigh the projected supply of North Carolina oil.

So, even without considering the damage to the marine environment caused by the rigs, or the disastrous effects of an accident, drilling is certainly a bad deal.

The necessity in saving the environment is in consumer behavior. The fluorescent bulbs, for example, are slightly more expensive than their less efficient counterparts. Fuel efficient cars may not have all of the extras which thirstier ones boast.

But those sacrifices have to be made by the consumers to counterbalance the business that damages the environment — through energy inefficiency and continued oil exploration — is bad business.

After all, supply and demand forces large companies to succumb to the will of the spending public. It is time to put some of that power to good use.

To get things done, consumers have to do more than complain to government. Consumers have to straight to the companies and let them know that environmental protection pays. Until that happens, the voice of the people won't be heard in the corporate world.

Let Me Comment On A Few Topics

BY PHILLIP LOUGHLIN
Contributing Writer

For lack of suitable inspiration, significant profundity, or acceptable topics this week, I think I shall just ramble along, randomly reaching into the recesses of my wracked reserves of resources.

I saw something terrifying on the news the other night. There was a report about police officers carrying video cameras on patrol. During the report, some footage was shown of officers being shot during routine traffic stops. This brings up a couple of things.

To begin with, I think it is a wonderful idea to equip officers with cameras. I also think it should be mandatory that they use the camera any time they do anything in the line of duty, and that they should be punished any time they fail to use it. This includes everything from checking out loiterers and routine stops, to domestic disturbances (more officers are injured working domestic disturbances than in any other capacity) and drug raids. The benefits of this would be myriad. The system would protect the officer and the defendant. A cop accused of harassment or unnecessary force would have video evidence to support his defense. If he is guilty, then there would be filmed evidence of his guilt. This would serve as a fairly powerful deterrent to police brutality. Of course there are weaknesses to the plan, but it would certainly prove to be better than what is going on now.

The next issue the footage brought up is, how far should

For those of you who may have forgotten, Hussein is still in charge over there.

we go with using amateur video footage on television. As I watched those officers being attacked, I could imagine the horror of the moment (Hell, I could feel the horror). It was enough to give you nightmares. I wonder how the families felt about seeing them.

I can see one possible scenario here. The networks could take advantage of the live and spontaneous action on amateur video to appeal to the "rubberneck" in all of us. They could highlight the gore and emotion of disaster as it happens to enthrall viewers. There would be house fires, car wrecks, shootings, and even mutilated bodies. Since this is "news" they could get around most of the censors (Remember the Madonna video on ABC's Nightline?). I'm certain this would not hurt their ratings either.

Several stations are paying pretty good money for taped news footage. This provides an excellent incentive for any mercenary to hop into the middle of a crime in progress or a police shootout. As the price of decent video equipment falls, everybody could get in on the action. I envision hordes of camera-armed citizenry marching through the streets and backways of urban America. This may be an answer to the increasing crime rate. Of course, there would probably also be an increase in camera theft as well.

Now for a reference to an earlier column. Remember what my friend Bilbo said about laughing at dragons? Last week, it looked like we might be re-engaging a defeated enemy, as Iraqi soldiers refused to release apparent evidence of their own little Manhattan project. For those of you who may have forgotten, Hussein is still in charge over there, and I don't think he's learned a lot from his experience. Let's not laugh yet.

Along the same lines, there is some debate going on over defense spending. On this one, I am not willing to commit. I will say this though. Those saying that there is no longer any threat from the "Red Menzies" are overlooking something. There are still enough nuclear weapons over there to make the U.S. (the western world?) into one big glow-in-the-dark desert. Along with those weapons, there is a tremendous political upheaval as little countries break from the union then try to find their own identities. What happens if some well organized militant loons (not like that pseudo-coup) makes his play for power? What if some Croat commando force stumbles into a missile emplacement in the countryside? The suggestions are far out, but the implications are a little scary. . . a lot scary.

(Fooled you again Smaug! HA ha ha YEEOW!)

Finally, where does a guy go in this town to see some decent a cappella Karaoke?

Learn To Open Those Closed Fists

We zoom from home to class and to the library from the cafeteria. We clutch schedules and syllabi in our hands and make long lists of chores and assignments.

Expectations of new surroundings, new people, roommates, professors and parents seem to mount and attack our inner citadel of security. This leaves us uptight and tense, dealing with our days with clenched fists. "I just have to get all of this stuff done!"

The wisdom of our world is the wisdom which says, "It's best to stand firm, to get a good grip on yourself, and hold your own against everyone and everything that demands of you. If you don't carry a weapon, you don't make a fist, and you don't scramble to get and keep what you need, then you're just asking for trouble. So, grab hold and go for it!"

I find real value and a measure of peace in learning to live less with clenched fists and tight shoulders, and more with open hands. We need to live with less grasping and clutching of days, people and tasks. It has to do with reclaiming control over outside forces that try to tell us what is important. It has to do with discovering (or rediscovering) that deeper self that allows us to set goals and arrange priorities consistent with our own sense of identity.

The more consistency there is between our internal self and our outward activity, the more ease and gentleness we will find even in the midst of busy days. Such an internal focus allows us to hold days, people, and tasks more gently and loosely. We will see with clearer vision all tasks and demands, and can move away from a stressful life.

Moving from a clenched fist attack on each day comes, for me, in prayer and meditation. In such times of solitude and silence, we can detach ourselves from all that claims our attention and demands our energy. We can put each day in a deeper perspective, that will allow us to live with more ease and gentleness. As you move further in this busy semester, I covet you such an oasis of silence, where you can plumb the depths of your own being and live into your world with more open hands.

Parents Weekend Could Be Trouble

BY PHIL SMITH
Contributing Writer

Please don't show this to my Mom!!

It happens once every year. Students fear it more than exams, great white sharks, and the boogie man. They hate it more than parking tickets, pop quizzes, and the Campus Police. It is worse than a dreaded disease, a poisonous reptile, or those people who call you on the telephone trying to sell light bulbs.

Students will avoid this event like the Bubonic Plague, Advanced Chemistry classes, and those people who want you to "sample a new fragrance," at the front door of Belk's. Actually, these perfume sprayers are paid exorbitant amounts of money to drench unsuspecting shoppers with some Polytethylglycol@$$#@? stuff that actually reacts with your brain cells, stimulates your credit card neurons, and causes you to purchase thousands of dollars worth of overpriced clothes. (Writer's note: The overpricing at Belk's is in no way related to the overpricing at the UNCW campus bookstore.)

Well anyway, you should get the picture, that this once-a-year dreaded event is not something to look forward to. It is (as you ready for this?) UNCW's PARENT'S WEEKEND 1991!!

Yes, for those of you who have had no contact with mom and dad (except for using their bank card) for over a month now, they just might be paying you an unexpected visit this weekend. For those of you whose parents were considerate enough to let you know they are coming, and thus gave you ample time to figure a way out of it, this announcement does not come as such a surprise. If however, you were unaware of this event or not intelligent enough to weasel out of it, then you do indeed deserve the torture that you will soon endure.

Why, you might ask, did you not hear about this Parent's Weekend? The answer is quite simple.

First of all, the planners for Parent's Weekend have a special U.S. Postal contract to deliver the invitation to Parent's Weekend WHEN YOU ARE NOT THERE. Secondly, the Parent's Weekend planners, being the thugs they are, always plan Parent's Weekend for the same weekend as Riverfest.

This headless plan serves two purposes. They anticipate that you will be in town for Riverfest and waiting unsuspecting in your dorm or apartment when mom and dad come knocking at your door.

And they anticipate that even parents who could care less about visiting UNCW will be enticed here by the Riverfest activities.

Now, for those of you who have been caught off guard by this news and face the difficult task of figuring out how to avoid this weekend with mom, dad, and little brother, I present for your reading enjoyment: Five ways to avoid Parent's Weekend.

1. Inform your parents that Parent's Weekend is only for students who are in academic trouble, and since you are an "A" student, they need not attend. Note: If your parents know that you are in fact a complete idiot and therefore an "F" student, then tell them this weekend is only for parents of outstanding students.

2. Break the bad news to them that the entire East Coast is under a hurricane warning, and that they will not be allowed past the Cape Fear River bridge.

3. If you are really creative, you could whip out your Macintosh computer, whip up a UNCW letterhead, and "sadly inform" your folks that Parent's Weekend has been over-extended (Gee, Kinda like everything else around here...) for the next _____ years. Note: Fill

Dave Barry Lawn Equipment Can Be Fun

Recently I had the honor of marching with the world-renowned Lawn Ranger precision power lawn mower drill team at the famous Arcola Broom Corn Festival.

Just in case you never heard of this famous event, let me explain that Arcola is a town in Illinois, just north of Mattoon. Arcola (slogan: "Amazing Arcola") claims the proud distinction of having formerly been "one of the nation's top producers of broom corn, the primary ingredient in brooms." The town is still a major power in the broom industry.

Each September Arcola holds the Broom Corn Festival, featuring among other events, a parade. For 11 years one of the key marching units has been the Lawn Rangers, who are considered by many observers who have had a couple of beers to be the finest precision lawn mower drill team in the world.

When the Rangers invited me to march this year, I accepted eagerly, although I was concerned about being able to live up to the unit's high standards, as explained in this excerpt from the official Ranger newsletter, written by Ranger co-founder Pat Monahan. "As always, we will be living our motto, 'You're only young once, but you can always be immature.' This is a fine motto, but it can be carried to excess. Here I am thinking of Pee-wee Herman."

On the day of the parade, Monahan picked me up at the Champaign, Ill. airport and drove me through large quantities of agriculture to Arcola. In addition to some nice grain elevators, Arcola boasts the nation's largest collection of antique brooms and brushes, as well as an establishment called the French Embassy, which is a combination gourmet restaurant and 12-lane bowling alley. I swear I am not making any of this up.

En route Monahan explained the philosophy of the Lawn Rangers, which is that it is possible for a group of truly dedicated men to have a lot of fun, yet at the same time do absolutely nothing useful for society. The Rangers' arch-enemy marching organization is the Shriners, who engage in worthwhile activities and are therefore regarded by the Rangers as being dangerously responsible.

Ranger Orientation took place in the garage of Ranger Ted Shields. About 50 Rangers were gathered around a long, engaging in intensive mental preparation as well as "shanking," which is when you sneak up behind somebody and yank down his shorts. Next we had the annual business meeting, which I can't describe in a family newspaper except to say that at one point a Ranger, using a strategically placed ear of corn, gave a dramatic interpretation of the song "Shine On Harvest Moon" that will haunt me for the rest of my life.

Then it was time for Rookie Camp. We rookies were each given a power lawn mower and a broom, and told to line up on the street, where we received intensive instruction in precision-drill maneuvers.

"LISTEN UP, YOU GRAVY-SUCKERS!" shouted our Column Leader, who carried long-handled toilet plungers to denote their rank. ALL MANEUVERS WILL START WITH THE BROOMS-UP POSITION! THE BROOMS WILL ALWAYS COME UP ON THE CURB SIDE!"

We learned two maneuvers: "Walking the Dog," which is when you hold your broom up while turning your lawn mower in a circle; and "Cross and Toss," which is when you cross paths with another Ranger, then each of you tosses his broom to the other. These maneuvers require great precision, and our rookies were forced to train in the grueling sun, for nearly two full minutes before we could perform them to the Rangers' exacting standards.

Finally it was time to march. We formed two columns, each of us wearing a cowboy hat and a Lone-Ranger-style mask. We were pushing a wide variety of customized lawn mowers, one of which had a toilet mounted on it. As we neared the main parade street, we stopped, gathered together, and put our hands into a huddle, where Monahan delivered an inspirational speech that beautifully summed up the meaning of Rangerhood:

"Remember," he said, "you guys are NOT SHRINERS."

Thus inspired, we turned down the parade route, went to the "Brooms Up" position and executed the Cross and Toss with total 100 percent flawless perfection except for a couple of guys dropping their brooms. Some columners were so awed by this electrifying spectacle that they almost fell down.

When it was over I stood with my fellow Rangers, engaging in further mental preparation and accepting the compliments of the public ("Do you guys have JOBS?"). At that moment I knew that I was part of something special, something important, something that someday, I hope, can be controlled by medication. But until then, Amazing Arcola, Ill., will serve as a shining example of why America is what it is. Whatever that may be.

THE HARDSOUL POETS and FLING HAMMER have as diverse styles as their names suggest.

Even so, they have played several dates together throughout the South, and Saturday night brought them to the Mad Monk.

The Charlotte-based HARDSOUL POETS feature a mainstream rock sound, with a little alternative and country thrown in for good measure. Lead singer John Crooke said, "[Our music] is hook-laden but not cheesy. It's more than I love you baby, you drive me crazy, let's go out tonight."

"It's almost a hybrid of music because we come from a diverse background," Crooke said.

Indeed, according to Crooke, if you like R.E.M., METALLICA, E.M.F., or the KENTUCKY HEADHUNTERS — you'll like the HARDSOUL POETS. This writer might agree — if you like R.E.M. the most.

Crooke and guitarist Reid Mansell are the only original members of the four-piece group. Drummer Mike Kenerley and bassist Mike Mitschele were picked up in the past couple of years (Mitschele was playing with the now-defunct FUNKENSTEIN).

With the exception of some newer stuff and a very respectable rendition of "Dr. Love" (1970's KISS rules), Crooke says, the set consisted of tunes from their latest recording, Private Radio. It's worth the price, which fluctuates according to the financial straits of the band. Pick it up at one of their shows, or buy it in Charlotte the next time you're there.

By the way, the first HARDSOUL POETS recording, an E.P. called Rail, is pretty rare, but it's worth whatever they're charging at the used record stores these days.

FLING HAMMER headlined at the Monk with a heavy funk/kindarp groove that, while it isn't really fair to do, tempts you to think of the RED HOT CHILI PEPPERS. Maybe FAITH NO MORE.

Anyway, you might not have to compare them to others much longer, considering their recording schedule.

Drummer Matt Brennan said that the band plans to record a live E.P. for small distribution in a month or two. In the spring, they're off to Los Angeles to record a demo with Lime Productions. Brennan said that producer Dennis Herring, who boasts a long list of alternative accomplishments, will shop the record.

They're live show is just plain fun to watch. Singer Carey Ray spit out lyrics at record speeds paced by bassist Morris Mitchell. Guitarist Will Martin entertained the crowd with some catchy rhythmic licks while simultaneously doing some pretty damn interesting things with his face.

Brennan did something you don't see drummers do much anymore — a solo. Not a bad touch.

FLING HAMMER is back at the Monk on Oct. 10. Given that, and the fact that going home for fall break is highly overrated, you've got something to do.

MECCANORMAL, appearing at Jacob's Run Wednesday night, will be the first band to kick off the weekly WLOZ Night.

Get ready to slap your side with the UNCW's Dept. of Fine Art's presentation of "MacBett." This delightful parody of Shakespeare's "Macbeth" by Eugene Ionesco tells the tragic story of a society being corrupted by greed and the lust for power, but with a humorously absurd tone.

Director Dr. Stan Norman and cast effectively capture the dramatic irony within the characters and take Shakespeare's typical comic relief to the outer limits.

The characters of MacBett and Banco, played by Brian Karasek and Jeff Lorraine, after being loyal to the sovereign power of Archbishop Duncan, played by Jebidiah Tona, are cunningly tricked by Lady Duncan herself.

Ola Ahmad convincingly plays the role of the beautiful Lady Duncan, whose body is possessed by an evil hag. Using her future-seeing power and feminine wiles, she successfully plants the seed of corruption in

The audience was delighted by the charming slapstick comedy and action scenes such as the thrilling sword fight. Scenes and characters came alive with the help of Tom Macie's set/lighting designs and costume/makeup designs by Toni Bratton. However, the stage set up was simple, showing great improvisational skills on the part of the actors.

UNCW University Theatre will be participating for the first time in the American College Theatre Festival. The production of MacBett has been chosen to represent UNCW in the national competition.

If you haven't seen it yet, you're in luck. "MacBett" is being presented again this weekend, Oct. 3-6 at the SRO Theatre in Kenan Hall. For ticket information call 791-9695.

You'll never laugh so hard at a tragedy.

Having Reasonable Doubts About TV

BY RAMONA HUPP

"The Fluff Meister"

May I be blunt? This new television season sucks. The question is why? With so many big screen stars making the leap to TV you'd think the quality would improve. But I guess to truly investigate why television is simply not fulfilling to today's society, I would have to examine the American public's changing values, and that sounds a bit too much like hard journalism to me. I try to stick as close to the "fluff" as I can.

I must confess that I have had little spare time to actually devote to my annual fall-show critiquing, but here are a few I have caught: The Good, The Bad, and The Really Bad.

The Good: Reasonable Doubts (Friday 10 p.m. NBC) Mark Harmon and Marlee Matlin come to the small screen. She plays a hearing-impaired assistant district attorney, and he is a hard-edged cop. The two are reluctantly teamed up together. Looked really good. Slick. Steamy. Sexy.

The Bad: P.S. I Love U (Sat. 5 p.m. CBS). At first I thought this was one of those insipid movie of the week deals. You can imagine my horror when I kept coming across it every weekend. Connie Sellecca (Hotel), and countless movie-of-the-weeks, hence my confusion) and Greg Evigan, (My Two Dads) are both in the witness protection program and yet they work for an investigation service. And I thought the goal of a witness protection program was to get away from criminals. Go figure.

The Really Bad: Silbs (Wednesday 9:30 p.m. ABC). Marsha Mason (The Godfather Part II), Jani Gertz (Less Than Zero) and Margaret Colin play sisters. One's married, rich and sensible, the other two aren't. Neither is the storyline. Scores brownie point for at least picking actresses who somewhat resemble each other.

The Gearman Cometh-For Only $4.50

BY ZACHARY BISACKY

Entertainment Writer

When I first started attending this school a little over a year ago, I was disgusted by the lack of good taste in music. Most of the people diverted from commercial radio about as far as R.E.M., and no one seemed eager or open to what they hadn't heard before. Fortunately, I discovered the campus radio station, WLOZ, where strange and unexplored sounds can always be heard emanating from its walls. The station embodied everything I desperately needed: unstructured play lists, freedom to select (even at random) music from a largely unfamiliar library, an atmosphere to express imagination and, most importantly, the opportunity to meet a swarm of refreshing and creative individuals. One of those persons I met was Erik Mattheis.

When Erik discovered that I was writing for THE SEAHAWK, he asked me to review his solo music project called GEARMAN. After consenting, I wondered what I was getting myself into; here was a man who donned lambochops that resembled crescent moons, took nearly a year off school to hike the Appalachian trail, and most frightening of all, hosted a show on WLOZ known as "The Lubricated Goat Hour." Clearly, this wasn't going to be an average forty minutes of music.

On GEARMAN's debut recording entitled "Why We Can't Be Friends", Mattheis has mustered up such a large spectrum of dissimilar sounds and styles that it is almost hard to characterize. GEARMAN produces a sound that is unmistakably its own by manipulating a collection of instruments such as five-string guitar, balalaika, trumpet, acoustic guitar, keyboard, and a set of electronic drums. Interestingly enough, Mattheis is responsible for all these instruments and even the vocals, with the exception of a twisted rendition of "Happiness is a Warm Gun" and the deranged "Spiritual Trump" in which James Sardone (BRICKBAT) plays guitar and Missy Randall sings, respectively.

Expecting to hear either post-punk alternative or guitar-oriented pop (the two genres that most college musicians fall into), it was a relief to aurally witness something distinctive and unrelated. GEARMAN's driving sound, which has been known to make ordinary listeners forget their shoe size, comes from the fusion of eccentric, techno-industrial keyboard "noises" and enigmatically tuned guitars. The vocals amplify this mind-altering process. At one point Erik's voice sounded like he'd been inhaling helium for the past six hours, and at other times could easily mistake for a half-muted trombone. The invariable changes and intrinsic tongue-biting melodies throughout the 25 songs prevent the listener from dozing off into the land of Cream. O' Wheat. GEARMAN draws comparisons to CAPTAIN BEEFHEART and BIG BLACK, two bands that virtually have nothing in common but together share "Gear" characteristics nonetheless.

The two most effective songs on the cassette are the guitar-driven "Green Eye", which is about the epidemic of television turning into a viewer's God, and the up-tempo "Chrome Decision" which opens side two with a blizzard of screaming vocals and chainsaw guitars. The main reason that these tunes stand apart is because they allow you to forget that Mattheis is a one-man band, while remaining quirky enough to let you know it couldn't be anyone else in Wilmington—or this galaxy for that matter.

Throughout the recording

there is a sense of imaginative musical experimentation blended with droves of buffoonery that make you burst out with uncontrollable laughter until you're breathing at the rate of a 40-year Marlboro® veteran.

Whether it's songs like "Space Food", which describes a hungry, self-centered adolescent aboard the Starship Enterprise, or "Countdown to A.C.", the story of a wager placed between Mattheis and his friend to see who would first find a girl with air-conditioning. GEARMAN has produced more cleverness and wit than I think he himself is aware of. Among "Why We Can't Be Friends" other cuts include three BEATLE songs that are very much unlike your average renditions. Rather than constructing duplicate copies of the songs like most bands would, Erik customizes each with a unique GEARMAN quality of reverberant vocals and cryptic keyboards that keep you checking the title to certify you are listening to the right song.

This tape is loaded to the hilt with personal creativity not only in the music but in the production of the cassettes itself; each 60 minute Maxell® cassette has been hand-painted with its own design and individually numbered. The tape's sound quality is exceptionally good for being recorded on a borrowed four-track recorder; actually this characteristic helps the music by giving it a more garage-band feeling.

The cassettes are currently available at School Kid's Music for a small fee of $4.50 (18¢ per song), or by writing Erik Mattheis 414-A Orange St. Wilmington, N.C. 28401.

If you're interested in seeing a live performance, GEARMAN will be at Paradise Cafe, Carolina Beach, on November 1st.

DID YOU KNOW?

Marla Maples, who has split once again from Donald Trump (sue for palimony, Marla), will be appearing on an upcoming episode of Designing Women.

1992. "That is a pretty realistic date unless there is an outside possibility the candidate is willing to move mid-year," Flyter said.

The provost is second in line to the chancellor. At the fall faculty meeting, Leutze commended Cahill for a job well done and voiced his support for Cahill as long as he retained the position. The chancellor also listed the requirements for the provost's job as that of the chief academic officer of the university. Leutze mentioned that the candidate needed administrative experience, an academic reputation, and ability to uphold the reputation of the university. Leutze also expressed he wants the candidate to possess the ability to deal with a large public, have initiative, energy, and the ability to work both on the inside and the outside.

Festival Gets Rolling

BY JON MARGOLIS
Chicago Tribune

CLINTON, Mont. — Forget the festival's title, the Round Man insisted. "This is no macho thing. This is a mellow thing."

The Round Man, which is all he wished to be called, is bearded, not very tall, and, yes, round. He manages a bar in Spokane, and together with his wife, Mary Kay, and a few friends, he was attending the festival for the sixth time.

He was not the only one who did not want to divulge his full name. Neither did Cooter, a garbage man from Soap Lake, Wash., nor Fat Freddy, a retired railroad engineer who was not very fat and who sat on a bar stool with his Chihuahua in his lap. "It's my cougar dog," he said. "Keeps the cougars away from my cabin."

Also on hand were perhaps 2,000 other people, which is a lot in these sparsely settled parts. They came from several states and at least two Canadian provinces and, as local artist-bartender Les Smith put it, "from all walks of life."

There were police officers and lawyers, schoolteachers and truck drivers, salesmen and students. There was Braden Bunch, who'd hitchhiked up from Texas to write an article about the festival for a magazine called Variable, sort of after its founder, Robert Smith, also known as Trebor (Robert backward) Variable, who has gone off to St. Petersburg, the name of which is also variable.

It was an eclectic crowd. Most were ingesting and all, by their presence, were honoring that storied institution of the American West — the Rocky Mountain oyster.

Which is not a mollusk. It is beef, part of the calf or young bull. More precisely, it is that part of the calf or young bull that renders it a calf or young bull instead of heifer. It is the part which, removed, renders him (or, now, it) a steer.

"It's 72 percent protein," said Rod Lincoln, proprietor of the Rock Creek Lodge, where the festival is held.

"You don't waste any part of the animal. It's the cowboy ethic and also the Indian ethic. Mine are triple-wrapped and hung in the shade."

The Rocky Mountain oyster is not just traditional Western food. It's also traditional Western humor.

But there is a price to be paid for this prudence. The thawed product is "too moist," Lincoln said, so he dries them out, soaks them in brine, marinates them in beer and dips them in a wet and dry batter before frying them.

Actually, most of the cooking is done by Jo Peterson, one of Lincoln's employees.

"It takes forever" to prepare them, she said, but only about two minutes to fry each batch. And does she eat them herself? Yes, though she "had to be forced to try 'em the first time."

It is not necessary to come to the Rockies for these oysters. They are available, if hard to find, elsewhere.

Neither the U.S. Department of Agriculture nor the American Meat Institute knows how much is consumed each year, but an official at the institute speculated it would be "less than one (oyster) per capita."

In Chicago, they are available at several restaurants and a few stores, according to Kiro Donev, a manager at Variety Meats. He said his firm sold "a couple of hundred pounds a week," along with other, even more bizarre, meat products.

The festival is a party, a blowout of dancing and listening to good country bands, eating the dish of honor, drinking copious amounts of alcohol and guffawing with friends new and old. Reading deep significance into it would be an error.

But there is an unmistakable, if unstated, covert aspect to the legend of this particular food. Even though the deep-fried glands being served were from cattle, the comments (not fit for repetition here) as well as the whole mythology of the Rocky Mountain oyster leave little doubt that the underlying fascination is with their human counterparts as metaphors for human maleness.

Many are the stories of the offbeat Easterner who thought he or she was eating seafood until given the particulars.

"We have our chuckles over it," Lincoln said. "Believe it or not, men are more squeamish than women."

The crowds come for the food, the entertainment, the tradition and the blunt title Lincoln has given his annual three-day party.

"I've heard about a lot of things," said Sheila Vaughn, who drove all the way from East Texas with her husband. "But never before a testicle festival."

Well, that's what it's called, and it's not the only one. According to one guest, there's an older and a bigger one every spring about 300 miles away in Rye, Mont.

Little wonder that this particular Western tradition has not received much attention. It is a delicate subject.

It is not a delicate food. It's kind of chewy, with a taste determined by how it's fried. And like almost everything these days, for all its earthy image, the Rocky Mountain oyster is as centrally processed as anything else.

Perhaps there are still some ranches that do it themselves, from sharp knife to deep fryer.

But the oysters served at this festival were bought in bulk, and frozen.

"I want them USDA inspected," Lincoln said. "You know how everybody is so sue-happy these days."

All of which is older, even, than cowboys. If it was not the first myth of Western Civilization, the story of Zeus dethroning and castrating his father was one of the first.

And one "testifies" in court because the ancient Roman took his oath in court holding his testes, "the symbol of his manhood," in the words of Midge Wilson, a psychology professor at De Paul University in Chicago.

Biologically, testicles are not symbols of manhood but its reality, though as Wilson said, "the sexiest organ of the body is the brain," and those Oriental potentates who thought their concubines safe in the care of eunuchs were deluded themselves.

Jim Clark's NFL Picks

It's here! It's here! No, not the phone book. It's The Seahawk's very own NFL prediction column. Each week I promise to deliver the insight you will seek Sunday afternoon, except sooner.

Why didn't I start before week 67 I did, except my dog ate one column, another ended up as a beer coaster, and more than one had pizza sauce on it. Honest!

First of all, the Saints won't win this week, I guarantee it.

The NFL West has a bye this week.

Dallas at Green Bay: The Cowboys prove they need to be taken seriously. It will be close, but Dallas 24-17.

Denver at Houston: After a week off, the Oilers win in the "House of Pain." It will be awesome. Warren and the boys 35-13.

Miami at New England: A weird way to clinch a tie?

The Dolphins don't have it this year, but neither do the Patriots. Miami 24-10.

Minnesota at Detroit: Forget about the opening game loss, the Lions are a play-off team. Lions 31-16.

N.Y. Jets at Cleveland: Despite a week off, the Browns are no match for the rearguard Jets. New York 24-9.

Philadelphia at Tampa Bay: Yeah right, Philly 31-7.

Phoenix at N.Y. Giants: Which Giants team will show up? It doesn't matter, Upset City. Cardinals 17-14.

San Diego at L.A. Raiders: Coming off a tough game, the Raiders won't fall. Raiders 23-14.

Seattle at Cincinnati: Sam Wyche says football isn't life or death. He's right, and coaches get fired. But not this week for Sam, Bengals 24-17.

Washington at Chicago: This will be a ball-control, grind it out, John Madden-type game. Bears have the better QB, 17-14.

Pittsburgh at Indianapolis: TNT paid tons of money for the right to this game. Boy did they get ripped off. Pittsburgh 35-9.

Buffalo at Kansas City: Anything can happen on Monday Night. This week it happens. Kansas City 27-17.

Right now, for arguments sake, here are my play-off teams: Buffalo, Houston, Raiders, Denver, Pittsburgh, and Kansas City in the AFC.

Washington, Detroit, New Orleans, Dallas, Chicago, and San Francisco in the NFC.

So there you have it. See you next week.

Basketball: Terry Pluto Reflects on Star Piston Guard

Thomas Should Check His Mirror Image

AKRON, Ohio — Isiah Thomas would like to blame Michael Jordan for keeping him off the 1992 U.S. Olympic team.

Perhaps Thomas faults the selection committee, figuring that most of these men detest the Detroit Pistons and Thomas is just a victim of discrimination.

Maybe Isiah believes Olympic (and Pistons) coach Chuck Daly didn't lobby hard enough for him, even though Daly did not have a vote and in the words of several selection committee members, "Made a moving and eloquent case for Isiah."

Thomas will look everywhere for a fall guy except in the mirror, which is why someone should tell Thomas the truth.

The 13 men who picked the roster for the first NBA-dominated team to play in the Olympics respect your individual skills, your ability to take over a game as few 6-footers ever could.

But they don't like your act. That is the story you hear from Those Who Were There, those making the decisions or those close to the man who compiled the 10-man roster.

Here is what happened: —Jordan never said, "If Isiah plays, I don't."

It's true that Jordan won't invite you to share his summer golf cart. To this day, Jordan wonders why you organized the famed Freeze Out at the 1985 All-Star Game when you told players not to

Baseball:

Twins Win AL West

BY JIM CAPLE
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

TORONTO — They didn't really celebrate their 5-0 victory, didn't let loose with the "We really did it!" howls, didn't triumphantly raise the index fingers for the cameras. Instead, the Minnesota Twins dressed quietly late Saturday afternoon, then began planning to meet at a downtown restaurant to watch the Chicago-Seattle game on television.

Chicago beat the Mariners 5-2 Saturday night to delay the Twins' quest to win their second American League West title in five years. The Twins, who have clinched at least a tie for the title, are the first team in baseball history to go from last place to first place in successive years. The best-of-seven American League Championship Series, likely against the Blue Jays, would begin Oct. 8 in the Metroland.

A weird way to clinch a tie?

"Put it this way," Twins first baseman Kent Hrbek said. "If someone said he'd give me $1,000 today or a $1,000 tomorrow, or a $1,000 next week, I'd wait around for it. I wouldn't care when I got it as long as I knew I was going to get it."

As it was, Minnesota's victory over the Blue Jays would have been a fitting clincher for the Worst-to-First Twins.

Jack Morris, a St. Paul native who came home to solidify Minnesota's pitching (while making millions for himself) shut out the AL East-leading Blue Jays on six hits. The nine scoreless innings put Morris over the top for all the incentives on his $3.5 million contract.

Chili Davis, the free-agent designated hitter signed to replace Gary Gaetti's bat in the Twins' lineup, scored the winning run when Greg Gagne brought him, and Shane Mack home with a two-run double in a four-run fifth inning off starter Tom Candiotti.

After that, it was a matter of waiting for the White Sox to unravel again. But since they didn't, the Twins can take matters into their own hands by winning the series finale against the Blue Jays this afternoon.

"It's weird," Twins infielder Al Newman said. "It's like one of those NFL wild-card playoffs games where everybody has to sit at home and watch the game on TV."

"I've had enough last-place finishes and I welcome all first places. Whether it's in the majors or the minors or the ball or tetherball," said Davis, who fueled the Twins' first-half charge. "Actually, I wasn't here for last year so I think it meant more for the other players."

Morris, the top-winning pitcher of the '80s, wasn't there either last year when Minnesota finished last in the AL West. But when he signed with the Twins last February he added a needed anchor of experience to the pitching staff. He also added plenty of quality innings as he rebounded from two subpar seasons that had some wonder whether he might be over the hill.

"It's hard to measure how much he's meant to us," Twins manager Tom Kelly said. "What's he got? Eighteen wins? How many innings? Two hundred-forty? He took a lot of wear and tear off the bullpen and he's led the way for the starters."

Morris (18-12, 3.50) gave up a hit in each of the first five innings but was able to work out of trouble each time. Given the four-run lead in the fifth, he cruised the rest of the way. He retired the final 11 batters he faced.

"He sort of took off after that," Kelly said. "Those last three innings, he was pretty dominant."

"I could smell it," Morris said. The game's crucial moment came with no outs in the fifth inning when Harper grounded to first and stepped on Candiotti's right ankle. Harper's spike left a gash that eventually needed five stitches to close.

But first, Candiotti tried to stay in the game. Candiotti, the knuckleballer who entered the game with the league's second lowest earned-run average, had the Twins baffled as usual before the injury. But he got whacked around immediately afterward.

After Candiotti took a few trial pitches, he gave up a single to Mack. That left runners Mack at first and Davis at third for Gagne, who drove a ball to the left field corner. Both scored when Blue Jays left fielder Candy Maldonado threw to second too late to catch Gagne and third base coach Ron Gardenhire wheeled Mack home.

Gene Larkin walked to chase Candiotti. Chuck Knoblauch, the likely rookie of the year who finally filled Minnesota's Black Hole at second base, delivered the clincher with a two-run single off reliever Jim Ackley.

The Twins added another run in the ninth and Morris closed it out.

"What I'm happy about was that from the first day of spring training there was an attitude that we had something to show people and we geared ourselves to being contenders at the end," Morris said. "It was one of the better springs I've ever been part of. And that's set a tone for this year."

Football: Ed Sherman Warns

FSU Passes First Big Game

CHICAGO — Mark Nov. 16 on the calendar. That's when No. 1 Florida State plays No. 2 Miami in Tallahassee in a game of stratophrisic proportions.

Both teams figure to hold their rankings by then, but Florida State coach Bobby Bowden isn't taking anything for granted. One day after his Seminoles beat No. 3 Michigan 51-31, Bowden already was looking ahead. And with good reason, because No. 10 Syracuse comes to Tallahassee on Saturday.

"This is the first time I can remember winning a game that was so big, and it doesn't mean a thing," Bowden said Sunday. "Maybe it'll mean more after the season, but not now. It only means we're 4-0."

Four down, nine to go for Florida State to claim its first national championship. Besides Syracuse and Miami, the Seminoles also have to play at hated rival Florida, Louisville and Louisiana State.

The pressure keeps building. Before the season, Bowden talked about being a target. Nothing has changed after four victories.

"We just got rid of one of the gunslingsers who can knock it off," Bowden said. "But that bull's-eye grows every time you win."

Florida State didn't make many mistakes Saturday, but if the Seminoles ever have to rely on their kicking game to pull out a last-second victory, they're in trouble.

The Seminoles made only two of five extra points, and missed two other two-point conversion attempts. Bowden lost so much confidence in kicker Dan Mowery that in an obvious field-goal situation in the fourth quarter, he elected to go for a first down.

"Which odds were best?" Bowden said. "You saw the game. We ain't kicked one lately."

Sunday, Bowden said the situation has to improve. He was undecided whether Mowery will be his kicker Saturday.

"The kicking has got to get better," Bowden said. "If we're kicking in a close game, we lose. It could have been, rather it should have been a loss Saturday."

Bowden was more than a bit ruffled by allegations by the Detroit media that Florida State didn't exhibit sportsmanlike behavior after the game. He was especially sensitive to being lumped in with Miami, although he tactfully said, "Miami is the best behaved team in football now."

Apparently, a Detroit columnist thought the Seminoles should have calmly walked off the field after the game, instead of whooping it up. It didn't appear to be excessive.

"That's the talk of losers," he said.

Bowden also refuted an allegation by Michigan tackle Greg Skrepenak that the Seminoles taunted the Wolverines during drills at Michigan Stadium on Friday. Florida State was coming off the field as Michigan was going on.

"When I got up Saturday, I was very upset when one of my coaches told me a Michigan player said we called them (unprintable names)," Bowden said. "No, 1, this is not true. When I met with coach (Gary) Moeller, I told him it wasn't true. He said he didn't hear anything about it. I was dumbfounded when I heard that."

You claim the Jordan and Bird stuff is ancient history, but if the U.S. should host an Olympic game, the committee wants the players to handle it with class.

They probably remembered last May ... the Eastern Conference finals when you led the Pistons off the court before the game was over so they wouldn't have to congratulate Jordan and the Chicago Bulls.

Did you think that no one in the basketball community was watching?

There reportedly was as much support for your Detroit backcourt mate Joe Dumars as for yourself. They know Dumars is a solid, unselfish citizen who also happens to be the best defensive guard in basketball.

But there also was some concern about how you would handle Dumars making the team while you were passed over. That could make for a very long NBA season in the Detroit clubhouse.

Given the international game's emphasis on 3-point shooting, strong consideration was given to Philadelphia's Hersey Hawkins and Indiana's Reggie Miller — two gunners whose range exceeds yours.

But they took the decision with grace; can you say the same?

—You had your supporters.

Piston general manager Jack McCloskey resigned from the Bowden then had the perfect retort. "If they don't like us so much, how come all those Northerners keep coming down here?" he said.

The media didn't punish Michigan as much as the coaches did in the latest polls. In the Associated Press poll, the Wolverines fell to seventh, one spot ahead of Notre Dame.

However, in the USA Today-CNN poll, Michigan dropped to ninth, one spot behind Notre Dame. Apparently, the coaches forgot Michigan beat Notre Dame less than three weeks ago.

Nebraska stayed in the rankings by beating Arizona State 18-9 Saturday. Also late Saturday, Southern Cal broke open a game that was 6-6 at halftime to flatten Oregon 30-14. Tailback Mazio Royster rushed for 111 yards and scored two touchdowns.

Also, Nebraska set a record in the AP poll by being ranked 15th. It marked the Cornhuskers' 161st straight appearance, breaking Michigan's record of 160.

selection committee when you were left off the team. It was a nice gesture for you, especially since everyone knows that you are tight with McCloskey's boss — Pistons owner Bill Davidson.

But it also reeks of Piston mentality: "If I don't get my way, I'm taking my ball and going home."

Your buddy Bill Laimbeer said he was going to sue because he was denied the chance to try out for the Olympic team, adding that the selection process was "sick."

To cure Laimbeer, a dose of reality is in order.

In 1988, 85 players received invitations to the Olympic tryouts. If 85 players were invited next summer, the 34-year-old Laimbeer would not be one of them.

Laimbeer's skills have deteriorated to the extent that this may be his final season and the Pistons are giving consideration to starting William Bedford at center.

Isiah, this ball game is over — at least for now. Another pro may be added in the spring, or one of the 10 players may be injured and replacements will be needed.

Maybe the committee will change its mind and invite you. But if those men don't, now you know why.

A "Cherry" End, It's Not

I'm maybe guessing here but... To play or not to play. That probably was the question facing senior point guard Joe Cherry all summer long. He probably was still considering it when school started in August.

Cherry had for three seasons seen his playing time go down. He had witnessed his role in the Seahawk offensive attack dwindle with it. He probably also observed the surplus of hungry young players recruited for the guard position.

So he probably said to himself, "Why bother?" Just walk away. Leave the frustration, confusions, and the uncertainties behind you. This year relax and have some fun. And Cherry did just that, leaving the Seahawk basketball program to concentrate on his psychology major studies in order to graduate on time.

An honorable selection, but why? To understand this we must dig a little.

Cherry was a stand-out point guard in his Fort Myers, Fla. high school. He averaged 31.2 points a game and was named 3A-4A Player-of-the-Year by the local media two straight seasons. Cherry came to UNCW in '88 with high praise, and soon broke into the starting line-up by game three.

The then-freshman appeared in 20 of 28 contests and averaged 7.3 points and 1.6 assists per game. He was named to the All-Rookie National Conference team and his future, as they say, looked fruitful. However, that would all change as things got sour and controversies arose concerning the talented freshman.

In his second season at UNCW, Cherry came to loggerheads with then-coach Robert McPherson about his relaxed attitude and his "rat-tail" haircut. McPherson felt the Fort Myers, Fla. guard wasn't pulling his weight on the team, not hustling all the way in practice. Cherry retorted back by criticizing McPherson's offensive strategy, labeling it "medieval in execution."

The coach would bench the vocal sophomore for eight of the last ten Seahawk contests. McPherson did this despite pressure from chanting home crowds, who demanded his "Put Joe in!" Later still, in that same year, Cherry butted heads again with the coach, refusing to run an extra ten wind sprints, punishment for being late. Cherry objected, citing this was his first offense, an act warranting only two extra sprints.

McPherson again benched the guard, refusing to allow him to accompany the team in the '89 conference post-season tournament unless he do the additional eight wind sprints. Cherry refused and missed the championships.

Last season, with a new coach, Kevin Eastman, and a new positive team attitude going into the season, Cherry probably felt he had put his past troubles behind for good. It would be now his turn to back in the sun again.

However, despite starting eleven games for the Seahawks, and leading them in scoring twice, he couldn't seem to find his rhythm again. The junior averaged only 5.6 points and 2.2 rebounds on the year.

Not shabby numbers, but disappointing to the young player, who averaged 5.9 points and 1.9 in the troubled '89 season where he sat out eight of ten games and played only sparingly in the two games he did participate in.

Cherry also knew that he wasn't the number one player in the minds of the coaches for the position. The Eastman club shuffled game line-ups more than a Las Vegas dealer did cards in a Blackjack game.

The coaching staff had looked seriously at guards, then-sophomore Reggie Veney, freshman Drew Phillips, and junior Mark Eaton. Cherry also probably knew that junior-transfer Keith Adkins would be ready to play for the '91 season. He would learn even later that Eastman had drafted another guard Chris Meighen for the Seahawk attack.

So he might have slacked off a little in practice, maybe not giving his 100 percent effort the whole time. He probably felt in the long run, what difference would it make? He would see limited playing time if he worked hard or not, so why bust one's butt for no reason.

Some coaches saw this attitude as a lack of motivation. To Cherry it was probably just the opposite. He didn't lack incentive to play harder, he craved it. He just hadn't seen it from the Seahawk basketball program for two seasons. And this fall, he finally got tired of looking.

So Cherry hits the books instead of the board this season. Scores an "A" on a psychology quiz instead of a jumper. He opts to work his mind rather than his body. It's admirable, but one has to believe he'll miss wearing the screams and cheers of fans in Trask Coliseum. He may smile too while checking a term paper he's just finished. He always knew where he stood with the fans.

Or possibly I am way off base here. Maybe Cherry just decided to stop playing ball because of his strong desire to excel academically.

Maybe. The only person who can truly answer that question is Joe Cherry.

But he has been unusually quiet of late. Hmm! Must have his head buried in a text book.

Cherry Leaves Seahawk Cagers to Study

BY PATRICK FOWLER
Sports Editor

A piece of the pie is missing from the UNCW men's basketball team. Senior point guard Joe Cherry will not suit-up for the Seahawks in the '91 season.

The announcement of Cherry's absence from the UNCW squad this season was made through a press release from head basketball coach Kevin Eastman. Eastman distributed the release after speaking first to Cherry on Saturday, Oct. 21st, and later Athletic Director Paul Miller, the following Monday.

Eastman states in the letter that Cherry will spend his final year at UNCW pursuing his degree for graduation.

"For whatever reasons, Joe's career has not been what he wanted it to be," Eastman said in the release. "It was the decision of the staff, in consultation with Joe, that it is best for him to spend his senior year in preparation for graduating. We've been discussing Joe's future for some time."

Cherry, a 6-foot-4 inch, 200-pound guard from Fort Myers, Fla. has played three seasons for the Seahawks. The senior's best season came in his freshman campaign when he averaged, 7.3 points and 1.6 assists a game. Cherry played in 20 of 28 contests, starting 11 of them after capturing the number one guard spots three games into the '88 season. Cherry was also named to the Colonial Athletic Association Conference All-Rookie team.

Cherry's career ran into problems from that point on.

Beginning in his sophomore season, Cherry bumped heads with then-head coach Robert McPherson. McPherson didn't care for the young guard's relaxed attitude or short "rat-tail" haircut and asked him to cut it. When Cherry refused, McPherson benched him for eight of UNCW's remaining ten games. The two games Cherry did play in were when the outcome of the game was already decided.

Cherry and McPherson bumped heads a week later as Cherry refused to run extra wind sprints order by his coach for being late. The senior contended that the extra sprints were not equal to the first time rule infraction. According to Cherry, a first offense called for two extra sprints only.

McPherson refused to allow the then-sophomore to accompany the team to the conference tournament unless he complied. Cherry did not, consequently missing the '89 tournament in Richmond.

Last season, under Eastman, the Fort Myers native started 11 Seahawk contests and averaged 5.6 points and 2.2 assists a game. The senior also led UNCW in scoring twice during the season. However, the senior shared many of the Seahawk guard duties with five other players, now-seniors Brannon Lancaster, Mark Eaton, juniors Reggie Seahawk midfielder Scott Leheria tries to beat his Francis Marion opponent to the loose ball. The Seahawks beat the Patriots 2-1, Monday afternoon. The Seahawk defeated East Carolina Sunday by the same score.

Strikers Take Two, 2-1

BY DAVID BARNHARDT

UNCW went two for two in home matches against Frances Marion and East Carolina this past week.

The Seahawks (3-3-1) defeated Francis Marion Monday 2-1 when Gerald Schwenk broke free at midfield and beat the Patriot goalie on a blast that found the upper right corner of the goal. UNCW defeated the Pirates Saturday, on a Greg Diamond's penalty kick.

Francis Marion struck first Monday, scoring 14:38 into the first half on an unassisted goal by Scott Rodriguez. Rodriguez stole the ball inside the penalty area, and punched the shot through past Seahawk goalie Tom Redmond.

The Patriots maintained the lead for most of the half until UNCW striker Adrian Peterson's goal late in the period. Peterson drilled the ball into the upper right corner on a Greg LaMendola assist. The half ended in a 1 deadlock.

The second half was a battle of defenses with neither side giving much on either side. Schwenk finally broke the scoring drought with the game winner for the Seahawks at the 65:30 mark. Francis Marion applied terrific pressure on the UNCW goal in the final minutes of play, but were unable to score.

Overall, the Seahawks dominated the tempo of the game outshooting their opponent 18-7.

"We opened the field better with our passing today," coach Jackie Blackmore said. "We didn't put our opportunities away as much as we should have."

Sports Briefs... Spikers Split Matches

Seahawks Go 2-4

UNCW split two of four matches this weekend at the UNC-Charlotte Invitational volleyball tournament.

The Seahawks (8-6) lost to Nichols State and Georgia Tech and defeated Western and East Carolina in the two-day competition.

UNCW started strong, winning their first two games against Nichols State 15-3 and 15-7. However, NSU would comeback on the Seahawks using a strong service game and big block points at the net. NSU won the marathon, 7-15, 7-15, 15-12, 15-8, 15-12.

UNCW would rebound later that evening defeating WCU in three straight matches 15-13, 15-11, 15-13.

Sunday, the Seahawks lost their opening match again, falling to the Yellow Jackets of Georgia Tech in four games, 16-14, 9-15, 15-11, 15-9. UNCW finished off their tournament sparring the Pirates, 15-11, 15-19, 15-15, 10-15.

Co-captain Leslie Knauss and setter Sheldon Pletovich had a solid tournament. Knauss recorded coach Blackmore added.

Saturday, UNCW continued their soccer dominance over arch rival ECU with a 2-1 victory. The Seahawks have won the last five meetings with the Pirates and lead the conference series 10-1-1.

The game was played in front of a vocal crowd of 575 people at Brooks field. Blackmore acknowledge the crowd as a driving force for the Seahawk victory.

"I believe the crowd was the difference for us in the game," Blackmore said.

The Pirates struck first or midfielder Mike Beck's goal. Beck's goal came at the 10:02 mark in the game on a boot into the left corner of the goal. He was assisted by Joe Hermann.

Gerald Schwenk tied the score for UNCW with less than three minutes left in the half. Schwenk's goal was unassisted.

The Seahawks refocused their offensive attack at halftime and went after the ball more aggressively as play resumed.

"We realized we had to put them away early in the second half," senior Greg Diamond said, "because we know we are the better team."

The second half saw both teams miss opportunities. The Seahawks, however made the goal on their best opportunity, cashing in on a Pirate foul inside the penalty box. Diamond scored on the ensuing free kick to capture the win for the Seahawks.

The Seahawks' next game is against William & Mary on Friday in Williamsburg, Va. The Tribe holds an 11-1-1 advantage in the series including a 3-1 win over UNCW last year.

Sports Briefs... Spikers Split Matches

45 kills and 43 digs in the four matches while Pletovich had her best outing against Nichols State. The junior amassed 48 assists, 24 digs, and three blocks on the night.

The Seahawks travel to Conway, S.C., on Oct. 3 to play Coastal Carolina. UNCW defeated the Chanticleers, who were also playing in another four-team group at the UNCC tournament, nearly a month back in Hanover Hall.

"We've already beat them 'pretty good in Hanover,'" head coach Kathy McDaniel said, "so they'll be up for the rematch."

NET LOSSES

There was no love-lost for Seahawk tennis players at the Landfall Tennis Center. The tennis facility was the site of the 91 Intercollegiate Tennis Coaches Association National Clay Court Championship, Sept. 22 through Sept. 29.

All eight Seahawk men and women players lost in the qualifying rounds of the tournament but all insisted they learned a lot from the experience.

"We got to play against the best, so we're ready for whoever we face during the season," junior Seahawk guard Joe Cherry fires a jumper last season. Veney, Kevin Hayden, and sophomore Drew Phillips.

Despite numerous efforts to contact both Eastman and Cherry, neither one could be reached for a comment. Eastman is on an recruiting trip in Pennsylvania.

UNCW still has five guards. Veney, Eaton, Phillips, junior transfer Keith Adkins, and freshman Chris Meighen will fill the duties for the Seahawks in the '91 season.

'Hawks Upset Wolfpack

BY PATRICK FOWLER
Sports Editor

Unlike the New York Jets last Monday night, the UNC-Wilmington Seahawks hung on to their lead in the waning minutes of last Saturday's home rugby match against North Carolina State. UNCW edged the defending state rugby tournament champions, 19-18.

"We were real nervous those last couple of minutes," senior fullback John Mizer said. "We had never been in that situation against State. It was always in the back of our mind they could come back on us."

The win, the Seahawks first over the Wolfpack, moves the Seahawk mark to 2-0 on the season. It is the best start for the club in recent years. UNCW plays in an collegiate four-team division consisting of East Carolina, N.C. State, and Duke. There are four divisions that comprise the State Rugby Association or S.R.A.

The Wolfpack, who were runner-ups to the tournament championship in '89 and champions in '90, had upset college division favorite East Carolina Pirates last week in Greenville. N.C. State entered their Saturday tangle with the Seahawks as the new team to beat in the division. UNCW was a heavy underdog, having falling to the Wolfpack, 50-0 Oct. 7th of last season.

"They were shocked after this game," Mizer said. "They didn't expect a tough game from us at all."

The Seahawks found themselves in a hole early as N.C. State scored a try (4 pts.), a try conversion (2 pts.), and a penalty kick (3 pts.) to take a quick 9-0 lead. UNCW managed to get on the scoreboard before the half ended with senior Allen Calahan's penalty kick with three minutes to play. The score cut the Wolfpack lead to 9-3.

The second half showcased a new Seahawk team altogether.

UNCW scored on its first three possessions. The Seahawks scored three straight tries and converted two conversions to race out to a 19-9 advantage. Junior Eric Carlson, senior Victor Lewis, and junior Chris Wagner scored tries for UNCW. Calahan and Wagner added the two try conversions.

From that point on, the Seahawks hung on for dear life.

The Wolfpack, with under five minutes to play began mounting a ferocious comeback. N.C. State struck for a try and a conversion to narrow the gap to 19-15. The Wolfpack cut the Seahawk lead to a single point adding a penalty kick with two minutes remaining making the score 19-18. However, the UNCW defense would again stiffen, holding N.C. State in check the rest of the game to complete the upset.

"We relaxed and got nervous when we had that lead late in the game," Mizer said. "But we managed to unify ourselves again and play hard, not worrying about penalties that might be called on us."

Sports Briefs... Spikers Split Matches

Cagle lost 6-3, 6-4 to Mitch Rubenstein of Michigan.

The women's squad fared no better: Sasha Doran, Cacy Kinney, and Sandy Williford fell in straight love sets 6-0, 6-0. Clare McQuillen and Erin Powell managed to take three games total from their opponents. McQuillen fell 6-0, 6-1, while Powell stayed on the court a game longer losing, 6-2, 6-0.

Midnight Madness

The UNCW men's and women's basketball teams will hold their first and only midnight practice of the season, Oct. 14, in Trask Coliseum. The second annual Midnight Madness workout will feature a local band, numerous prize giveaways, loud rock music, and both the men's and women's basketball '91 squads.

Captain Cagle and The Coconut will start the pop rally at 10 p.m. Free Seahawk prizes will be passed out during the evening until the basketball teams run through their practice drills at the midnight hour.

The event is free.

Collegiate Alcohol Use National Use Decreases

BY KAREN NEUSTADT
College Press Service

The old image of an "Animal House" beer-swilling fraternity source doesn't make it with the new generation. Drunken behavior, say students, is definitely uncool.

This new attitude toward alcohol is showing up on American campuses during the 1991 National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness Week, Oct. 13-20. From booze-free nightclubs to "mocktail" parties, the message is clear: imbibing is OK — getting wasted is not.

"I believe it's because students are more health conscious these days," said Kurt Bair, a senior counselor at Dickinson College in Carlisle, Pa. Students are still drinking, but in less quantity than before, he said.

A recent Roper survey showed that more than half of all students (53 percent) consider alcohol abuse a major problem on campus. That was dramatically higher than student concern about non-violent and violent crime, drug abuse and AIDS.

In addition, a newly released University of Florida study claims the number of students who drink is less than it was a decade ago, and those who do are drinking less.

The study showed the percentage of student drinkers decreased from 89 percent in 1981 to 80 percent in 1991. Average consumption among drinkers also dropped from 40 drinks per month in 1981 to 34 drinks monthly in 1991.

"The study clearly shows that college student drinking patterns and knowledge about alcohol changed significantly during the decade of the '80s," said Dr. Gerardo Gonzalez, chairman of the department of counselor education.

While the figures appear encouraging, experts say that one in 10 drinking students will develop a chemical dependency.

"It is still a major problem," Gonzalez said. "The majority of students drink, and campus incidents of violence and sexual assault are usually alcohol-related."

Approximately 430 million gallons of beverages are consumed annually by college students who spend about $4.2 billion on booze each year, according to the Public Health Service's Office for Substance Abuse Prevention.

In 1990, 33.5 percent of drivers in fatal crashes between the ages of 20 and 24 were intoxicated, a 6 percent drop since 1982, says the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration. Still, the government estimates that 1,093 lives were saved in 1989 by laws that prohibit alcohol sales to those under 21.

Even when alcohol use doesn't become chemical dependency, college campuses must grapple with its effects, such as poor academic performance, aggression, property damage, accidents and strained relationships.

Experts say alcohol also plays a significant role in cases of date rape, a problem receiving increasing attention.

Many campuses now offer resident drug and alcohol counselors, and some programs for those dealing with the devastating effects of alcohol

Alcohol Awareness Observed

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

This week, has been declared National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness Week 1991. Alternatives! has scheduled banners, displays, window displays and events related to the subject of alcohol in observance of the week. Some of the events scheduled are speeches, a contest and campus wide events. Today's event is called "Got 175, Faced With Alternatives?"

The event is giving students the opportunity to throw pies at faculty and staff. Among those involved are Dr. Bill Bryan, vice chancellor of Student Affairs, and Hunter Davis of the Campus Police. A student will be involved as well. To throw the pie, the student must sign a pledge to remain sober on a given day.

A contest was held on Tuesday and it involved towing a wrecked car to the University Union's west lawn and filling it with cans. The object of the contest was to guess how many cans were in the car. The car was accompanied by a limousine, which was part of the first place prize of a free limousine ride from Prestige Limousine Services and dinner at Windows Restaurant at Shell Island. The winner of the prize was Reed Walmsley. Second prize went to Erin Anderson, who won an Alternatives! T-shirt. Third prize winner Anne Marie Fay won a B-100 t-shirt and a cassette tape. As well as serving as a prop for the contest, the crashed car served to illustrate the hazards of drinking and driving.

Friday's event is a campus-wide event, which promises to be dramatic, moving and emotional. At noon, "Taps" will be played simultaneously at various stations on campus. Some of the stations involved are inside Randall Library, in Wagoner Hall, on the steps of the Social and Behavioral Sciences building, Cameron Hall, the University Center, and at the flagpole in the Alderman Quadrangle between Alderman and Hinton James Halls. Other academic buildings and residence halls will be among the total of 12 stations involved in the event. The tune is being played to bring attention to alcohol abuse. Throughout the week students, faculty and staff have been asked to wear black clothes if they knew someone whose death was alcohol-related.

Speeches this week included the topics of drinking and driving and laws involved with it. On Tuesday, Trooper A.J. Alberson gave a presentation entitled "The Young, the Restless and the Intoxicated." Alberson's presentation was on drinking and driving. Wednesday a presentation was given by Joe Briley of Alcohol Law Enforcement. Briley's, "Everything You Want to Know About Alcohol and the Law and Weren't Afraid to Ask" was about the law and alcohol and the liabilities and responsibilities involved with it.

Cameron Seeks Accreditation

BY JENNIFER WILSON
Staff Writer

A team appointed by the American Assembly of Collegiate Schools of Business (AACSB) will visit the Cameron School of Business November 3-6 to determine whether it will become accredited. If accepted for accreditation, UNCW's Cameron School of Business will earn national recognition as being one of the top business schools. It will join an elite group of around 780 schools accredited by the AACSB.

If accredited, the Cameron School of Business will offer students the benefit of attending a well-recognized school and the possibility of being recruited by one of the many prestigious firms that hire business graduates. Accreditation will also benefit the school with the possibility of recruiting more faculty members.

Since being founded as one of two professional schools, the Cameron School has grown from 16 to 35 faculty members and from 76 to 369 graduates. The past eight years have been spent increasing the quality of the school in preparation of applying for accreditation. The team visit is a result of this preparation.

The school moved out of Fear Hall three years ago and into its present location of Cameron Hall. New faculty members were hired, the academic curriculum was worked on, and finally a self-made study was presented to the AACSB to become accredited.

The faculty of the Cameron School compiled the study with a detailed examination of the school's faculty, staff, academic programs, physical, financial and human resources. The study was presented in terms of a set of standards established by the AACSB concerning curriculum, personnel admissions, faculty, the library and computing services.

The AACSB reviewed the study over the summer. Recently it recommended a four member team of deans from other schools to visit and evaluate the Cameron School of Business. The team will talk with the dean, faculty and students of the business school and visit the Chancellor, and other campus sites to determine if the school has progressed far enough for accreditation.

Thomas Hearing Transcripts. . .

BY DAVE BARRY
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

CHAIRMAN BIDEN: Judge Thomas, these past few days have been very, very hard for all of us — especially my good friend and colleague Sen. Kennedy, because it is not easy for a man to sit through three full days of hearings with a paper bag over his head — but before we let you go, there is just one more point I want to make, and it is a very, very important point, and I fully intend to make it if I ever get to the end of this sentence, which as you know and I know, judge, is highly unlikely to occur during the current fiscal year, so...

SEN. HATCH: I want to say that I am disgusted. These are disgusting things that we have been talking about here, and I personally am disgusted by them. Public hair! Big organs! Disgusting. And yet we must talk about them. We must get to the bottom of this, no matter how disgusted we are, and believe me I am. We must talk about these matters, the public hair and the big organs, HUGE organs, because it just makes us sick, to think that these kinds of matters would come up — I refer here to the organs, and the hairs — that we here in the United States Senate would find ourselves delving deeply into these matters, to be frank, totally disgusts me, both aspects of it, the hair aspect AND the organ... CHAIRMAN BIDEN: Thank you.

SEN. HEFLIN: Judge Thomas, (30-second pause) I certainly appreciate (45-second pause) the fact (20-second pause) that (three-minute, 20-second pause) my time is up.

SEN. THURMOND: Scamwhan ben cudrin' n'neah widin tan' bust drag.

TRANSLATOR: He says, "Somebody has colored my hair with what appears to be Tang breakfast drink."

CHAIRMAN BIDEN: Thank you. May I just add that the top of my own personal head appears to be an unsuccessful attempt to grow cks. But judge, as soon as I make this one final point we're going to let you go, because this has been very, very painful, and believe me I know what pain is, because at one time in my career I was the son of a Welsh cock miner, and let me just say, judge, that when I do make this point, whatever it is, it will be something that I believe in very, very deeply, because I am the chairman, and I can talk as long as I want, using an infinite number of dependent clauses, and nobody can stop me.

SEN. HATCH: How BIG an organ? How MANY public hairs? These are the issues that we need to probe deeply into, no matter how much they disgust us! And believe me, nobody is more disgusted than I am! I am revolted that we are thinking about these disgusting things, day and night! Tossing and turning, trying to sleep, writhing and moaning and...

SEN. KENNEDY (from under his bag): Are the cameras still here?

CHAIRMAN BIDEN: Judge, we know you're tired, and we're going to let you go in just a moment here, just as soon as I make this one point...

SEN. THURMOND: Deah wheah on lenah yet?

TRANSLATOR: He says, "Did we eat lunch yet?"

Hawk's Nest Gets A Facelift

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

Students will see a change in the Hawk's Nest. Over Fall Break, renovations to the snack bar took place. Some of the changes include a "char-grill" and new cash lines. The renovations took place over nine days, including three days that the school was open.

The new cash register lines, which were once located at the rear of the serving area, have been moved out into the dining area. Along with the move, the register lines have been expanded. Both of the sides of the register have been opened and tray slides have been installed. The expansion of the registers is "to make the traffic flow more effectively and to serve the needs of the customers," said Charlie Maimone, director of Housing and Food Services.

As well as moving the registers, the design of the snack bar has been altered. For example, there are now drinks available on the wall to the left and straight ahead as a customer enters the service area. Another new addition is a bar down the middle of the service area. The bar is divided into a self-serve potato bar, a taco bar and a salad bar. Under this bar, there is plumbing and shelf space for storage to increase the efficiency of the space.

The serving area has a new color and new signs to complement the color scheme of the Hawk's Nest. The signs also designate the area into smaller areas like Grill, Deli, and Drinks. Maimone also expressed interest in color coordinating the workers' uniforms with the scheme of the eatery.

A change in the expansion of the service area took place with the expansion and renovation of the kitchen and grill area. By placing items that were once in the grill area on the hot bar, space was opened up for chicken items.

The expansion of the area has enabled an increase in menu choices. Both Maimone and Bill Estep, manager of the Hawk's Nest, said that there has been great success with the "Treat Yourself Right" entrees that are offered. They also said that with the char-grill, the food will appear more pleasing to the eye and that the grilled chicken is being well received. As well as the grilled chicken, popcorn and bulk food are now part of the items that can be purchased.

Another big change for the Hawk's Nest is their recycling program. All the cardboard and styrofoam products have been eliminated. The paper cups for drinks are remaining because of the convenience. In place of the paper plates and bowls there are now china plates and bowls similar to those in Wagoner Hall. The plastic silverware has been replaced with stainless steel silverware. Estep said, "The china is important. We want to make customers aware of why (they are recycling) and urge them to work with us. So far, it's working well." Maimone also mentioned that they are trying to work out a program to recycle the plastics used here on campus by making Wagoner Hall a pick-up site for plastics.

Some changes may go unnoticed. The mess is expanding and there will be specialties coming. "Because of the new char-grill, our hamburgers taste better," Estep said. Another change is the configuration of the tables which now makes it easier to move about in the dining room. The back room of the dining area is now being kept open to accommodate seating demands.

Maimone said that the renovations cost approximately $38,000 in total. Costs were cut by using workers from on campus such as electricians, plumbers, maintenance and movers. "These were a lot of people involved and we tried to keep it local." Although the Hawk's Nest is open for business Maimone said the renovations are never over. Some of the changes he expressed interest in included are, the color of the menu boards and the purchase of a new oven for the kitchen.

Next week will be the grand re-opening of the Hawk's Nest. Estep promises that there will be surprises during the week. Among some of these surprises, will be daily special coupons and drawings. Both Estep and Maimone encourage everyone to stop by and enjoy the renovated facilities.

Estep also said he is working to get an increase in programming at the Hawk's Nest. "There are facilities competing and not as many people in the Union as there used to be." Estep encourages everyone to come check out the "new and improved" facility, especially at dinner. Food Services Director David Long said if business after 4:30 does not improve, the Hawk's Nest could be shut down at 4:30.

At a Glance...

CONGRATULATIONS!!!

Congratulations to the winners of the "Count the Cans in the Wrecked Car" contest which was sponsored by Alternatives! in observance of National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness Week, October 14-18. First place winner was Reed Walmesley who won dinner for two at Windows Restaurant at Shell Island and Limousine service to and from dinner by Prestige Limousine Service. Second place winner was Erin Anderson who won an Alternatives! T-shirt and third place winner, Anna Marie Fay, received a B-100 T-shirt and a cassette tape.

CHILI COOK-OFF AND CONCERT

The Fifth Annual Chili Cook-Off, sponsored by Jackson Beverage Company, will get underway Saturday, October 26th at 2:00 p.m. at Hugh MacRae Park. Proceeds benefit the Domestic Violence Shelter and Services in Wilmington.

Admission to the park and outdoor concert is free. There is a $3.00 donation to sample chili. Cold drinks and other food are also available. The concert features the bands, FLASHBACK AND DESPERADO.

Three cash prizes will be awarded by a panel of culinary experts to the Chili Cook-Off teams preparing the best tasting chili and a fourth cash prize, the People's Choice Award, will be based upon votes by all those who sample the chili.

VOLUNTEERS are needed to sell tickets at the park. HELP us make this another successful CHILI COOK-OFF. If you've volunteered in the past, you know you'll have a good time - if you're a new volunteer, come join the fun.

For more information on the Cook-Off or Concert, contact Carolyn Dought at the Domestic Violence Shelter & Services, Inc. at 343-0703.

UNCW CAMPUS POLICE TO HOLD AUCTION OCT. 19

The UNCW Campus Police Department will action all unclaimed, recovered and seized property at 9 a.m. Saturday, Oct. 19, behind the police building on Price Drive (in the back, southeast section of campus). Interested buyers may view the items for auction from 7-9 am before the sale begins.

Items for sale include 80 bicycles, several musical instruments, a Canon 35 m.m. camera, book bags, and some miscellaneous jewelry. By state law, proceeds for the sale go to the New Hanover County School Board. (Contact: Lt. Charlie Willis, 395-3184.)

PREREGISTRATION FOR MATH 101

Students who plan to preregister for MAT 111 Spring 1992 must have a satisfactory, up-to-date (less than 1 year old) by January 13, 1992) UNCW Mathematics Placement Test score BEFORE you pre-register. If you do not have a satisfactory score or your score is out of date, then you must take the placement test. Call the Mathematical Sciences Department, Extension 3290, to schedule a time to take this test before you preregister. Those who sign up for the course without satisfying this prerequisite will be dropped from the course.

FROM THE CASHIERS OFFICE

Pre-registration for spring is October 30 - November 12. Students with outstanding debts will not be allowed to pre-register without first paying their debt. If you have any questions about debts, please call 395-3147 or come by the Student Accounts Office in James Hall.

CAPE FEAR MUSEUM VOLUNTEER COFFEE

The Cape Fear Museum, formerly New Hanover County Museum, will host a volunteer coffee at the museum on Thursday, October 24, 1991, at 10:00 a.m. for anyone interested in becoming a volunteer in the newly expanded museum. Volunteers currently assist in all areas of the museum and more are needed to help operate the completed Cape Fear Museum, which will open to the public Saturday and Sunday, January 18 and 19, 1992.

"This is an exciting time for the museum and its rejuvenated volunteer program," says Volunteer Coordinator Karen Smith. Museum staff will present grand opening plans for the museum and describe the many volunteer opportunities that are available both weekdays and weekends.

For more information about volunteering with our school groups, gift shop, or collection, please call the volunteer coordinator at Cape Fear Museum at (919)-341-4350.

SCHOLARSHIPS AVAILABLE

Twenty-five scholarships are available for undergraduate students majoring in engineering and science disciplines. Sponsored by the U.S. Department of Energy (DOE) and administered by Oak Ridge Associated Universities, the scholarships are designated for those students interested in pursuing careers in environmental restoration or waste management (ER/WM).

Scholarship applications are being taken through Jan. 31, 1992, and awards will be announced in May 1992. For applications or more information contact Peggy Gibson, Environmental Restoration/Waste dependency. Programs run the gamut from chemical-free housing to alcohol-awareness speakers and seminars.

Dickinson College has organized a peer drug and alcohol education program in which trained students speak to campus groups about the consequences of substance abuse.

Alcoholics Anonymous and Al-Anon programs for students are held weekly on the sprawling University of California at Los Angeles campus. The California school's residential life program sponsors videos, seminars and presentations by psychologists during Alcohol Awareness week.

A newsletter is distributed to UCLA students, and officials work with local merchants in an effort to promote discount sales of non-alcoholic beverages during the week. By producing a registration card, any UCLA student can obtain alcohol counseling without charge.

Gettysburg College in Dalton, Pa., takes an unusual approach to fighting substance abuse on campus by offering "chemical-free housing" in which students pledge to abstain from alcohol while in the house and not to become intoxicated if they drink elsewhere.

Gettysburg also sponsored a "mini-convention" of students from regional colleges who are in recovery from chemical dependency.

The University of Utah at Logan, Utah, celebrates Alcohol Awareness week a week later, but has one of the most comprehensive programs in the country.

The week's events include everything from a candlelight vigil for drunken driving victims to a contest for the best "mocktail" recipe on campus. Students watch the police conduct a sobriety test and watch improvisational theater that spoofs alcohol problems.

The University of Utah substance abuse center brings in disabled persons, victims of alcohol-related accidents, to talk with students. A disk jockey who calls himself the "Milk Beast" touts the marvels of non-alcoholic beverages at a campus-wide dance.

Alcohol-free parties, once thought an impossibility in campus life, are "in" during Alcohol Awareness week at Antioch College at Yellow Springs, Ohio. After five years of observing Alcohol Awareness week, the school offers a residence hall that is both smoke-free and alcohol-free.

At "Zanzibar," an alcohol-free nightclub at Mansfield University in Pennsylvania, sober students rock around the clock during Alcohol Awareness week.

The school also has a 35-member drug and alcohol task force comprised of students, faculty, administrators and town residents who review and evaluate prevention programs to ensure they meet the needs of the community.

At Zenselaar Polytechnic Institute in Troy, N.Y., 18-year-olds can't drink. Fraternities and sororities offer entering freshmen a 90-minute seminar called "Party Positive" that emphasizes the ban on drinking, but also teaches sensible drinking when a student comes of age.

"Party Positive" describes precautionary steps many fraternities already take: proofing students at the door, offering sober rides after parties, and requiring students to check their keys at parties.

Students Heidi Hughes and Scott Sturgeon relax near the University of Gainesville.

AMAZE YOUR FRIENDS, DELIGHT YOUR FAMILY AND MAKE EXTRA CASH TOO !

Yes, you can amaze your friends (and yourself), delight your family and make extra cash too. It's easy, it's fun and you can learn how in LESS THAN 3 MINUTES.

The NEW BEADERY AT RARE CARGO has all that you need to create original, unique costume jewelry. The instruction is FREE, it takes just minutes and the necklaces, bracelets, anklets, earrings and other beautiful items YOU CREATE will amaze and delight.

The awesome collection at THE NEW BEADERY AT RARE CARGO offers hundreds of varieties, sizes, shapes, and colors (REGGAE COLORS TOO). The beads are imported from all over the world and are made of glass, bone, shell, horn, ceramic, seeds, wood, and metals.

We'll show you how to make jewelry to match every one of your outfits and YOUR CREATIONS will be one-of-a-kind originals, no one else in the entire world will have exactly the same thing. YOUR CREATIONS will make wonderful gifts for family and friends and they will have that PERSONAL TOUCH that no assembly line, store-bought trinkets can ever have.

It's so much FUN and it's SO EASY, you'll find that you'll really get into it. Once you learn how you can make more in your spare time right IN YOUR OWN ROOM. The beads are so unbelievably inexpensive, (many sell for just pennies, none are more than a couple of dollars), that you may find you'd like to offer some of your creations for resale. An investment of $3 could bring you a return of $8 to $12 !

You don't even have to be a salesperson. Folks will admire your creations and say something like... "Those are great earrings, where did you get them? And you'll say, WITH PRIDE, "I made them, want me to make something for you?"

Come on downtown to THE BEADERY AT RARE CARGO and see for yourself just how fast, easy and enjoyable it is to create your own costume jewelry. IT COSTS ABSOLUTELY NOTHING to find out.

Proposed Drop-Add Policy Is A Bad Idea

The faculty senate proposed a new policy for the near future which will make a bad situation worse.

The new rule would allow professors to drop any students who don't attend the first class of the semester, without the students' permission. There is a provision to the plan that the student can stay in the class if he contacts the professor within 24 hours of the first class.

In these days of over-enrollment, hectic registration processes, and mass dropping and adding, the new provision will provide another useless technicality that students will have to worry about.

Because it is a rarity for students to get every class they pre-register for, over-booking class schedules is common. That is, students regularly register for classes they really don't want, and often don't need, simply to maintain a desired number of credit hours. Some students have to be registered for a minimum number of hours to maintain financial aid.

The effect is a large number of students who will try to drop their unwanted classes and add better ones at the beginning of each semester. This may require students to attend their desired classes on the first day, in lieu of the classes for which they are enrolled.

This situation may continue for more than the first day. Professors will often ask students to attend the class for an entire week before agreeing to add them. Granted, part of the reason for this is that the professors are waiting for no-shows to drop, hoping that the class size will shrink enough to allow people to add. But the new system will not remedy that problem.

Under the new plan, students will simply notify their enrolled professor to hold their place—at least some of them will. Obviously, other students will be dropped because their message wasn't received by the professor. After all, we students know some professors who are notoriously difficult to get in touch with. It's even worse considering the growing number of part-time teachers.

The final result of the plan will be more hassle for the students who are already trying to deal with all of the complications involved with the beginning of the school year.

The registration process does need improvement, but this plan isn't what we're looking for.

WE WERE WRONG.

An editorial which appeared in the Sept. 26 Seahawk indicated that Student Body President Curtis Wilson was silent about a controversial issue at a North Carolina Association of Student Governments meeting. It was assumed that because Wilson refused to comment in the days after the meeting, he did not comment while at the meeting.

In fact, Wilson said that he did take an active stance against the cartoon at the Chapel Hill meeting. We apologize to President Wilson and to our readers for the error.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dear Editors,

If the land behind Cameron School of Business is a natural laboratory for the study of North Carolina wetlands, as reported in Sunday's Morning Star, what exactly is the land (a mere stones throw away) that has recently been hacked and leveled for the sake of a parking lot? I can't help but wonder if Chancellor Leuze was really aware of the value of that land, while he was busy knowing that invisible, omnipotent group of Governors that graciously made it possible.

Perhaps this is a good indication of the priorities, or lack thereof, in this administration. Do convenient parking spaces really take precedence over the survival of the animals that happen to live there? Will this newly implemented policy of regional involvement come at the expense of this university's dedication to natural areas that were at one time a major recruiting tool?

Not only is the issue of environmental conservation torn out of this ill-advised eyesore, but what good is a parking space if the classes you need have been cancelled due to heinous educational budget cuts? What difference does it make how close you are to the residence halls if you can't live there due to overcrowding? As for research, these parking spaces will be a long way from a library adequately stocked with vital and necessary literature.

Before this compounded blunder was set in motion, did anyone bother to look at the alternatives? What about strictly limiting freshman parking privileges or establishing park and ride locations in conjunction with the Wilmington Public Transport System? They could HEAVILY encourage more biking and walking to class, or build on already clear-cut land, or even consider the possibility of constructing multiple parking decks on existing lots. Or would that not be too much with the new policy of enhancement?

Personally, I feel this latest architectural enhancement will only compound the problem Chancellor Leuze is blindly attacking and the board of governors are nodding obays to, while trying to make their dollars as visible as possible regardless of the minuscule request. I do not see UNCW for the ones, the birds, the air, and the nature, as well as the education. I did not come for the parking. If I wanted a pretty, busy, nice, beautiful, spacious campus, I would have gone to Chapel Hill.

Listen To Your Own Inner Voices

Persons who seek to live life with any direction and deeper meaning for themselves, tend to hear their inner voices. Whether lost and alone without seeing any clear path into their world or blocked from insights because of multiple demands upon their time and energy, the meaning-seekers have both the need and the possibility to listen to the voice within.

The basic principle here is that every person has an inner reality that has a sound or voice. We have become too externalized, so that we have grown accustomed to the harsh noises of traffic, television and rock music. And who, amid such a cacophony, is able to hear the subtle voice of the innermost core?

The task is far from easy. Many voices need to be heard. These voices are those of other people who seduce, threaten, demand, preach or shout at us. Then, there are the voices within us, equally varied and contrasting.

These are the voices of neuroses, which criticize, mock, and condemn us as we try to do our best. Last, there is the voice of loneliness. When no one else encourages us, we do it for ourselves like a child talking in the dark. Then, again, there are the voices of doubt, a thousand anxious questions assailing us. Maybe we listen to the voice of our regret, pursuing us with hammering persistence.

Often the voices belong to the people in our lives. Outer voices have become inner, and continue to speak to us. All of these voices have an emotional impact. These voices touch us deeply and give shape to our personality. These are basic matters. Tell me what voices you listen to and I will tell you who you are.

The deep inner self has a voice too. On occasion it prevails over other voices by its power and clarity. Like a vibration mysteriously springing from silence, it reaches us with a life and will of its own. Once we have heard it, we know what we must do. It guides, inspires, and regenerates us. It is the voice of our holy core, the core where self connects with God and where truth for us resides.

That voice is there. It is the only unfailing source of clarity that can guide us through the confusion caused by hearing all the other voices. Because there is so much noise in our life, the "Voice from Within" has to be intentionally sought out. We have to discover what it sounds like for ourselves. We then have to develop the kind of silence that will give us moments where we can become more and more familiar and trusting of this inner direction. There is no other means of being true to ourselves than learning to hear our inner voice and attending to its guidance.

But, it does take discipline. It does take intentional quieting of the noises outside of us and the noises within our mind if we are going to discern our own true voice. Personal peace and inner security lie only on the path where we are true to our own deepest self. And learning to listen is our only means for walking this path.

The will of God is not hidden in some heavenly reality nor in any cloak however holy. It lies in the deepest heart of your selfhood, for it is there where God speaks your truth.

Phil Smiths Analysis of the . . .

Thomas Hearings—This Ain't George Will

Well fellow Seahawks, I hope you all had a relaxing, refreshing, and reviving fall break. Actually now that I think about it, this was not much of a break. I mean most of us only attend class three or four days a week anyway, so what's the big deal about getting two days off just to go home and deal with the parents? If you were fortunate enough to have some sort of real "break", then more power to you.

I for one, watched a lot of television while I was at home. There was, as you may have noticed, quite a variety of intellectually stimulating programming available over the past week for your viewing pleasure...NOT!! On ABC there was the Clarence Thomas confirmation hearings. On CBS there was the confirmation hearings for Clarence Thomas, and NBC there was of course the judicial hearings for the confirmation of Clarence Thomas. These hearings would have been on the Playboy channel, but the Playboy channel censors deemed hearings "too sickly perverted, even for us." The only alternate television shows included a documentary on PBS entitled

"Sexual Harassment: How should you really pronounce it?" and a "Long Dong Silver" rerun on "Cinemax After Dark".

I of course, watched the confirmation hearings, partly because I thought it was an excellent opportunity to witness our great system of government: writing another piece of monumental history, and also because I had already seen the "Long Dong Silver" movie. Anyway, I did watch a large portion of the testimony involving the allegations by law professor Anita Hill that Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas had displayed inappropriate (I refuse to use such words as sex, breasts, penis, pubic hair, or lying with in my column) behavior with her eight years ago when she worked for him.

These proceedings caused a virtual shutdown of other activities in Washington, D.C. Suddenly we forgot about Saddam Hussein, the Soviet Disunion, Middle East peace talks, and the major league baseball pennant race. And all of this in the name of democracy!!

First of all, I think the whole affair was a mockery of our easily and quite often mocked system.

The intense, intrusive interrogations by the Senate Judiciary Committee were, to me, reminiscent of the time I went to register my bicycle with the Campus Police and was forced to answer all sorts of questions about my personal life. Only after I confessed to once wearing a pair of Seahawk boxer shorts did they issue my bicycle identification tag.

Secondly, we must consider the panel of senators questioning the integrity of Judge Thomas, a man guilty of no more than heaven forbid flirting with a lady in his office. Among these distinguished officials are Ted Kennedy, a known alcoholic manslaughtering sex fiend; Joseph Biden, a known plagiarist; Dennis DeConcini, fresh out of Savings and Loan Scandal; Strom Thurmond, a coot from the world's center of intellectual thought (South Carolina); and Paul Simon, the only man on Capitol Hill with a tacky bow tie. My personal favorite of the senators is Howard Baker from Alaska. Call it coincidence, but he bears a striking resemblance to what Elvis would look like if he were really still alive.

Now I think it is time that I make a little confession of my own. I certainly don't want any skeletons in my closet (you know, like Jeffrey Dahmer). You see, I can never be a Supreme Court Justice because of something that happened when I was sixteen years old. I had stopped in the local Hostess Bakery Shop for some of their sweet rolls, which I loved very much. "I really like your Honey Buns," I told the lady behind the counter. She took what I said the wrong way and was obviously offended. "Oh, what I mean is I'd like some of your sweet cakes," I replied. She also took this wrong and began ranting about how I was a teenage pervert. The rest is just too embarrassing for me to tell. But she vowed that someday she would get me back, and if I ever was nominated to the Supreme Court of the United States, she would go public with allegations of sexual harassment. ONLY IN AMERICA!!!

Until next time.... Keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

Phillip Loughlin

It's All A Big Inner Conspiracy!!!

My friend and I had lunch the other day. Having exhausted the popular topics of the day, we turned our discussion to more obscure subjects. We discussed the Thomas hearings.

"Why do they have to make such a big deal out of this thing?" he groaned.

I started to answer him, but I knew how pointless that would be.

"I mean, one nominee withdraws because of allegations that he is a drunk and a womanizer. Another withdraws because he admits using marijuana. The most we saw of these guys was a profile on the nightly news and maybe a tearful speech."

"Now we are getting full media coverage of hearings over whether Clarence Thomas asked Anita Hill, an employee, for a date. He asked her for a date, for god's sake! Now she's saying that he sexually harassed her."

I had to interrupt. "Look man, there's a lot more to it than that!" She said he described his sexual prowess and compared himself to a porn star. He also described porn films graphically to her. On top of all this, she felt that she would lose her job if she complained. That's sexual harassment."

My friend smirked. "Do you really believe that? I mean come on man. Thomas is not some corny Neanderthal off the street. I do not believe he would say something like that. I believe he may have asked for a date, but I have my doubts about the rest of Hill's story."

"Well why would she go through all that trouble and humiliation to tell a lie," I asked. "What in the world could she have to gain?"

My friend shoveled a spoonful of steamed vegetables into his mouth. "Look," he mumbled. "There are any number of good reasons to try to pull what she did. Money is a good guess. What if someone paid her big bucks to come up and sink Clarence Thomas?"

He stumped me with that one. The possibility that she was making this testimony for money had never occurred to me. "Who do you think might have paid her?" I asked, naively. "The Democrats?"

My friend laughed, spewing tiny chunks of squash across the table. "No. Don't you see? What would the Democrats gain by shooting him down? Bash would just pick another nominee and this one might be even less agreeable to their palates. This whole deal was set up by the Republicans."

I just stared. I thought of paranoid delusions and voices from God.

"Don't look at me like that," my friend said. "I'm deadly serious. See, it's a subtle but ingenious plot. They make it look like something the democrats cooked up, then tear it apart."

"They sent someone to Professor Hill and made the deal with her, that if she'd make the accusation they'd pay her X amount of cash. They'd use their own techniques to make sure the press would get hold of the story and give it full coverage."

"Not only did they get the chance to kick some Democrat butt, they also got a chance to do some free campaigning. I mean, it was shameful watching the Senate on both sides take advantage of this opportunity to bandstand their individual views on feminist issues. That's why nobody came right out and said Anita Hill was lying. That would anger too many voters. Besides, they knew Thomas would come out on top. It's also fairly ironic that while these guys spew platitudes, they are not bound by any of the discrimination laws that are in question here."

I shook my head, but I'm not really sure if I agreed or not. The hearings had not convinced me either way. "So, you really don't think the things Hill said about happened?"

"No way. Let's look at the case. First of all, Hill waits ten years to come forward. In the meantime she converses with Thomas on the phone. After escaping his advances at another job, she comes to work with him again. Somehow, the logic of that eludes me. . . that is, if he really did the things she said he did."

"Then, when the committee asked those other women about working with Thomas, none of them had ever known him to do anything remotely like what Hill described. It seems to me that someone who makes advances like those Thomas is accused of would have done it more than once. If five or six women came forward and made the same claims, or even if the other women said that Thomas spoke lewdly on occasion, Hill's story would have been more believable. But they didn't. They all said quite the opposite."

"What about that newspaper lady, Wright?" I asked him. "She made similar accusations. She agreed that his reported behavior was totally in character with the man she knew."

"Yeah, but I don't really give any weight to that either. I mean, she said he asked her out. Is that a crime? And she said he made a crack about the rise of her breasts. I agree that there are women who take that kind of thing personally, maybe it was a subconscious thing to say, but is it harassment? I think not—certainly not to the scale of the accusations Hill is making. I think Wright's case, if anything, is purely tangential."

I was unwilling to take him on anymore. It worried me that he might be starting to make sense. I looked at my watch. "Man, don't you have a class at 2:00?"

"No, that's only on Tuesday and Thursday." He shrugged and started to continue his lecture.

"Today is Thursday!" I laughed.

He jumped up and started running for the door. "Dump my tray for me," he shouted over his shoulder.

I stood and began clearing our table. Now, what to do on a Wednesday afternoon?

The Miami Vice Trend Setter Now In Paradise

By GLENN LOVELL
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

I liked "Paradise." A lot. But I wasn't supposed to. How come? Because it's a Don Johnson movie and it's a given that Johnson — a.k.a. "pretty boy" Johnson — doesn't make good movies.

So when I checked in with my editors and reported a thumbs-up rating for "Paradise," which opened Oct. 4, I got responses that ranged from "You're kidding! — right?" to "Ummm — isn't that the one with Don Johnson?"

Talk about a bum rap. Johnson has been maligned almost as much as Sly Stallone. The big difference: Johnson can act, and even when his material is wanting — as it usually is — he's decent-to-good in a cocky, easy-going sort of way.

Why, then, is he at the top of the box office?

Probably because his roots are in exploitation films, such as "The Harrod Experiment" (where he met a 14-year-old extra named Melanie Griffith) and "Return to Macon County." In the early '70s, he was pegged, then dismissed, as another smug James Dean wannabe. That label stuck, even after he appeared in the post-apocalyptic cult attraction "A Boy and His Dog" and the strongly acted post-Vietnam-stress syndrome drama "Cease Fire."

By the mid-'80s, Johnson decided to go with the flow. Translation: He loaned his laid-back, fashionably seedy manner to the hopped-up, fashionably seedy "Miami Vice." The show, of course, was a trend-setter and Johnson got lots of tabloid press. Result: He became rich enough to concentrate on features at the very time the media wrote him off as a flash in the pan, an action star who would go the same route as Starsky and Hutch and the Mod Squad.

Johnson surprised everyone by segueing into a romantic ensemble ("Sweet Hearts Dance"), a dandy film noir ("The Hot Spot") and the underrated John Frankenheimer conspiracy thriller "Dead-Bang." His only misfire was this summer's "Harley Davidson & the Marlboro Man," a daffy buddy movie in which he acted Mickey Rourke under the table by not acting.

And now comes "Paradise" and lots of raised eyebrows. Suddenly, Johnson as the disappointed-in-love Ben Reed is a character actor to be reckoned with. Even his longtime critics concede he's good as the quietly resentful shrimp-boat captain who's reunited with his wife (Griffith) by an inquisitive young visitor. The anti-Johnson contingent is surprised. I'm not. I've always liked Johnson. Even before it became fashionable.

Gonna Do That Circle Thing

It may not start out that way, but your English class will eventually form in a circle. Trust me. I'm an English major. I know. You just can't get around the issue. Since King Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table, it's been hard to break the circle. It's just a matter of time before your English professor gets around to it.

The legends say that King Arthur had a round table specifically made to promote civil debate and equality among his stately group. And not so coincidentally, (and perhaps hence its place in English classes) it was during this time that inspired many to write some of the greatest literature of the Middle Ages.

Did King Arthur have any idea what he was starting? Did he really want to encourage harmony among his men? Did he do it because he wanted to look each man squarely in the eye? Truth be known, he probably just wanted a good view of everyone's feet. Don't laugh, my Aunt Zelda never trusted anyone who didn't have well-kept shoes. Come to think of it, she had a huge round table too... I digress.

My main question is how the Knights of the Round Table handle those naughty knights who came in late. Did the other knights suffer through that humiliating and awkward scooting of chairs that seems to occur in every English class approximately five minutes after it has officially begun? Or did King Arthur make them sit in the center of the circle, like many English professors are tempted to do? ... Again, I digress.

Like it, or not, the infamous circle is here to stay. Just walk through Morton Hall on any given day to convince yourself. It's just a matter of time before this phenomenon reaches all the buildings on campus, except Cameron Hall, of course. It is highly unlikely that you will ever find the "infamous English circle" lurking in Cameron Hall. Cameron Hall made sure of that. They nailed the damn chairs to the floor. Ironically, you would think business majors would benefit more from the mysterious power of "the circle." Their success depends on remembering faces, meeting each other eye-to-eye, and building lasting contacts — something that "the circle" seems to encourage.

Looking one squarely in the eye — talking directly to one another — I don't know, it seems to me this kind of interaction is lost on neurotic closet-ridden writers who more than likely will spend the better part of their lives conversing with a computer screen.

Perhaps we here at UNCW could start a new trend. Get one up on King Arthur. I hear the triangle possess mysterious powers. Yeah...Right!

Bringing You Another Musical Extravaganza

By SHANNON DAVID
WLOZ Correspondent

Attention WLOZ listeners, it's a concert update.

WLOZ Night has been a big success. On September 23rd BRICKBAT opened for HOLLOW HEYDAY. On October 3rd VOODOO SQUID, a Wilmington based band performed, and just last week MECCA NORMAL jammed with BLUE CHAIR and BLUE GREEN GODS.

The next musical extravaganza is scheduled for October 21st, when we will hear from SEBADOH, SEAM and AZEELA SNAIL.

SEBADOH includes a former band member of DINOSAUR, and SEAM plays with former member of SUPERCHUNK. These bands play a wide range of styles, so it should be a good show.

PRISON SHAKE will open for MY DAD IS DEAD on October 26th. The group PRISON SHAKE has a dry, biting sense of humor with a slop groove-ify feel to their music. MY DAD IS DEAD is a noisy hypocritically resigned band with quirky lyrics. They sound fairly similar to JOY DIVISION.

THE BUZZCOCKS might (I said might) play on October 28th. They are one of the legendary British bands who were at the forefront of the punk:

explosion in 1978. The band broke up for awhile and some of the members went on to form FLAGS OF CONVENIENCE. But they are back together now and will be performing some of their old classics as well as some new pop tunes off of their new unreleased LP. (Because THE BUZZCOCKS are such a well known band you can expect the admission price to be more.)

GOD BULLIES, off of Amphetamine Reptile Records, are tentatively scheduled to play in October also. They will probably play songs off of their past album Dog Show and from their latest LP Join Satan's Army. According to record critic Paul Radzik, GOD BULLIES' sound is that of "anister guitar noise that should be played during the credits of some grade B horror flick."

Down the untraveled road into November we can look forward to the spontaneous lively show from the HEAD OF DAVID and TAR on November 7th. November 13th we will be treated with the energetic speed funk of the DWARVES.

If there are any bands that you are dying to see perform at Jacob's Run on WLOZ Night, just let us know at the station and we'll see what we can do. We have got a lot of great music coming your way, so stay in tune with WLOZ (Room 20-U.U.).

Hearings Have Public Mad At Senate

BY WILLIAM NEIKIRK
Chicago Tribune

WASHINGTON — The ugly, tawdry nature of Clarence Thomas' confirmation hearing flows from an increasingly polluted American political stream that thrives on scandal and personal attack and diverts attention from pressing national problems.

Regardless of the truth of Oklahoma law professor Anita Hill's explosive allegations of sexual harassment by Thomas, Thomas' case underscores that the growing nastiness of the confirmation process has its root in the poisoned, divided nature of American politics.

The point of departure for this decided turn for the worse is itself a matter of partisan wrangling. Republicans trace it to the Watergate era, blaming it on Democrats. Democrats charge that George Bush's 1988 campaign fired the first volley, with its Willie Horton commercials attacking presidential candidate Michael S. Dukakis.

But this climate has given rise to a paradox. Even as the process demands greater ethical and moral standards on the part of candidates for high office, it has failed to yield cleaner government. In fact, the number of scandals has risen, and government is losing esteem in the public's eyes.

Washington lives under a cloud of suspicion that the system has turned fundamentally corrupt and inept. The savings and loan scandal, the closing of the government a year ago, check-bouncing and free-loading by members of Congress, as intractable federal deficit and the power of money to influence elections have combined to tarnish government's name.

Former Sen. Eugene McCarthy of Minnesota said to a friend the other night that the emphasis on scandal stemmed from the fact that Congress, faced with a massive federal deficit of nearly $1 billion a day, was frustrated in its efforts to tackle the nation's many economic and social problems as its members were able to do in the old days.

"It's going to get dirty enough that term limitations will become law," said Pat Choate, an economist who was fired from TRW Inc. after he wrote a book criticizing Japan's use of money to expand its influence in Washington. "The attitude is that if it's legal, it's OK."

Term limits, once considered a fringe idea, gain in political respectability with each new scandal or with each new failure by Congress and the Bush administration to deal with pressing domestic issues, such as jobs, drugs, crime, education and health care. Under today's scheme for financing elections, the deck appears stacked in the favor of incumbents.

The insulation of members of Congress coincides with what has become an explosive growth in the number of scandals in recent years. In terms of magnitude, none compares with the savings and loan scandal, which could well be the most expensive in U.S. history.

The Reagan administration and members of Congress codified and protected the industry during its wild, irresponsible ride to oblivion during the 1980s. Former House Speaker Jim Wright was forced to resign partly because of his involvement in it. And five senators were accused of influence-peddling over a failed savings and loan headed by Charles H. Keating Jr.

Thomas, Hill and the Senate may feel that they are victims of the confirmation process. But the push for political reform reflects a growing belief that many Americans also consider themselves victims of today's polarized politics, which avoid tough economic and social problems.

Suzanne Garment, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute who published a book about Washington scandals, said a key impact of all the scandals is that "some of the best people will be terrified to go into public life."

Money and sex are the key ingredients of government scandals, which date to the founding of the Republic. Alexander Hamilton wound up paying hush money to a woman named Maria Reynolds, with whom he had an affair. There were the Credit Mobilier in the Grant administration and Teapot Dome in the Harding administration. Warren G. Harding said that with friends like he, he didn't need enemies.

Harding and John F. Kennedy had mistresses in the White House. The press generally took a tolerant attitude toward sex scandals until the 1950s to 1960s, but has moved aggressively in this area since. Gary Hart lost any chance of being president because of it.

Thomas' case also demonstrates that the public is demanding a higher degree of probity from those who stand for high office. When the allegations of sexual harassment became public, the outrage expressed by women across the country delayed the planned vote on Thomas' nomination.

The force of the outcry, based on the belief that the sexual harassment accusations were being brushed off, stunned the largely male Senate, which was on the verge of approving the nomination. It seemed to reinforce the impression that Congress and the White House were out of touch with the people, especially women.

But the divided nature of government has increased conflict between the branches and led to more personal attack.

Shut out of the White House since the Carter administration, Democrats have rarely a chance to express themselves in a truly national, high-profile forum, such as the confirmation process for a Supreme Court justice affords.

Bush stirred the pot of controversy by appointing a conservative black judge without a sterling judicial record and said he was not naming Thomas to the court merely because he is black, a statement that left many incredulous.

And so the well-oiled machinery of modern political life went into action. The White House brought in a former Reagan administration official, Kenneth Duberstein, to guide Thomas through the shoals of nomination.

Interest groups opposed to Thomas began searching for "dirt" in his past, going so far as to put advertisements in newspapers in search of it. Democratic staff members scoured the record and his past in hope of finding something that would trip him up.

Choate, the economist, is not alone in believing that the news media, especially television, feed this process of confrontation gripping politics.

"Everything is done by TV," he said. "The printed word in this town doesn't mean much anymore. TV is about emotions, while writing and discourse is about thinking. This enables a president to get up and say, 'This (Thomas) is the best man in the country for the job,' and get away with it, even if he's not."

But once Hill's allegations became public and she appeared to be credible in TV interviews, the White House's carefully orchestrated media campaign fell apart.

Congressional investigation into such matters is entirely appropriate, since a key constitutional duty is involved. But to some critics, the process has taken on the texture of an inquisition rather than advice and consent. For controversial nominees like Thomas, the process is apt to be more rigorous, more prosecutorial.

Appellate Judge Douglas Ginsburg withdrew his name as a Supreme Court nominee in 1987 after he admitted to smoking marijuana previously. But, Garment notes, he was the target of a conflict-of-interest investigation dating from the time he ran the Justice Department's antitrust division. No charges were filed, but Ginsburg had legal bills estimated in the six figures.

Yet, some who have complained about the confirmation process have also found some good aspects. C. Everett Koop, Ronald Reagan's controversial surgeon general, wrote in his memoirs that "although painful, humiliating and infuriating at the time, the ordeal (of confirmation) would prove important to my success as surgeon general. The people I needed to win over in those first nine months would in the years ahead become my allies for the health of the American people."

Sexual Harassment Is A Difficult Problem

BY KAREN HELLER
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

In the last few months, it seems we've heard more accusations about the private lives of public figures than ever before. Now Anita Hill has pointed a long finger toward Clarence Thomas, accusing him of something for which there is no evidence, no record and no other witnesses.

Sexual harassment is an ugly, fuzzy mess. It's hard to prove, hard to prosecute and even harder to shake off once the charge is made — for both the accuser and the accused.

In a land where people live to litigate, the first known court case didn't surface until "six years ago" it wasn't until 1986 that the Supreme Court ruled that sexual harassment was equal to sexual discrimination. This is "one of those issues that makes our stomach hurt," as Patricia Ireland, National Organization for Women vice president, succinctly put it.

Harassment, like obscenity, is difficult to define. But, just like Potter Stewart, many women will tell you "they know it when they see it."

The problem is, men often see something else entirely.

Look at Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., who dismissed Hill's allegations due to, among other things, "the absence of any touching." Look at all those confused senators charging that the basic problem with Hill's accusation is its tardiness, neglecting to mention that it was the FBI who contacted Hill (rather than the other way around, as some senators led people to believe), neglecting to mention that the Senate Judiciary Committee basically neglected her comments in the FBI report.

From Oct. 1, 1989, until Sept. 30, 1990, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which Thomas once supervised, received 5,694 sexual harassment complaints, up 52 percent from 1981. But studies show that as few as 6 percent of all incidents ever result in filed complaints. As we all know, whistle-blowers, of any ilk, do not tend to win popularity contests.

I asked around. I asked women if they had ever been sexually harassed on the job. Many of them said yes, but then paused and added, "Well, it depends how you define it."

Who does the defining? The superior talking about dirty movies, or the man who says touching should be involved?

Something else has got me worried, besides the harassment charges and the men-will-be-men attitude of the Senate.

The Thomas confirmation process was almost 100 days old when the judge asked for a reprieve to call his name. And during this endless investigation, Thomas' character — his triumph over poverty, his ascent into the inner sanctum of power — was discussed far more than his experience.

There's a line in Chekhov's "Uncle Vanya" where the beautiful Yelena turns to plain Sonya and says, "You have lovely hair," to which Sonya responds, "They always say you have lovely hair when they can't think of anything else to say."

And they tend to talk about character when they can't refer to solid judicial experience, important decisions or landmark cases. You didn't hear senators going on about character when Scalia, O'Connor or Rehnquist were submitted for their approval.

In a land of 724,000 lawyers, almost 700 federal judges and more state and municipal judges than you can buy, George Bush has nominated a man with a total of 17 months on the bench and a rocky history at the EEOC. Last year's Supreme Court nominee, David Souter — although a Rhodes Scholar and a judge since 1978 — hails from New Hampshire (whose cases don't tend to get national scrutiny) and is so private about so much that who knew what he thought about recycling, let alone capital punishment and "Roe v. Wade?"

Guess the prevailing White House wisdom is that it's better to nominate someone who has been on the bench for three minutes or has been hiding his opinions in New England than suggesting a jurist with a long, established record that — equal! — might reveal the person's views on abortion and other issues.

I would settle for a little less emphasis on character for a national reputation for judicial and legal excellence. They started all this business talking about Thomas' character and, apparently, that's the way it's going to end.

But at least one good thing has come out of this mess. People have more contempt for United States senators than ever before.

GAINESVILLE, Fla. (CPS) — A University of Florida professor has developed a quick and simple AIDS test that will be sold over the counter to people outside the United States within a year.

The "dipstick" saliva test, developed by Roger Clemmons, a professor in the school's College of Veterinary Medicine, also is effective in detecting hepatitis and soon may detect other sexually transmitted diseases. The test takes eight minutes to detect HIV virus and will cost about $5 per test.

FutureTech, a spinoff company, has established foreign manufacturing of the test and will market it outside the United States in early March.

The test will be available in the United States after it's approved by the Food and Drug Administration in about 18 months. Because of FDA rules, however, it will be offered only through health-care professionals, not in stores.

(head)Guide Says Tuition Rising At Public Schools (endhead)

PRINCETON, N.J. (CPS) — Tuition at four-year public colleges rose at a sharply higher rate than at private schools in academic year 1991-92, a survey says.

Peterson's Annual Survey of Undergraduate Institutions, conducted for the past 22 years, showed an overall increase of 13.2 percent for state resident tuition and fees at public, four-year universities, compared with a 9.1 percent increase at private, four-year colleges. Two-year institutions showed a similar gap — a 9.5 percent state resident increase at public schools vs. a 5.1 percent hike at private schools.

In some cases the increases were massive. For state residents, costs jumped 49 percent in New York, 41 percent in California and 20 percent in Kentucky.

The information in the survey forms the backbone of Peterson's annual guides to 1,950 colleges in the United States and Canada. (head)NCAA Presidents Continue To Tighten Control (endhead)

KANSAS CITY (CPS) — A powerful NCAA commission has decided to put together a handbook for college presidents to give them more clout in dealing with booster clubs and other donor organizations.

David Warren of Ohio Wesleyan, a member of the NCAA Presidents Commission, said the handbook would strengthen the power of college presidents over booster groups that have a tendency to run amok. He also said that the presidents' group would continue its reform movement.

"The presidents are in this for the long haul," he told a news conference Oct. 2. "We're going to have a planning process over the next three to four years to keep before the NCAA those matters we feel most strongly about."

The NCAA will take up academic reform during its convention this January.

Boat Owners Have New User Fee To Pay

BY KRISTIN PATTERSON
Capital News Service

WASHINGTON — Nine of every 10 recreational boat owners are facing fines, beginning Tuesday, for failing to pay a new user fee, the Coast Guard says.

Only 392,705 of the nation's 4.1 million registered pleasure boats — less than 10 percent — had the mandatory user fee decals as the deadline neared, said Chief Petty Officer Thomas Heffick, a Coast Guard spokesman.

If you're caught without the decals — which cost $25 to $100 depending on the size of your boat — the Coast Guard said you'll probably pay two to four times as much in fines, although the law allows a penalty of up to $5,000.

Heffick said the Coast Guard won't go out of its way to find boats without the decals, but any that are stopped for other reasons will be checked for them.

The user fee has been widely criticized since it was enacted as part of the 1990 budget package.

and Boat/U.S., which represents 400,000 recreational boaters, has filed suit in U.S. District Court to overturn the fee.

"The government is making criminals out of hundreds of thousands of recreational boaters," said Michael Scullia, vice president of Boat/U.S., which is pushing Congress to repeal the fee.

A repeal bill has passed the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, which is dominated by coastal state lawmakers, but it is bogged down in the House Ways and Means Committee.

In the Senate, a repeal measure attached to the Coast Guard authorization bill is awaiting floor action, but contains no provision to make up the more than $700 million the fee is expected to raise over the next three years.

The Bush administration is against repeal, contending it isn't abandoned a deep appreciation of melody or a reverence for the blues.

Say!, Where Are Those NBA Scouts?

A basketball game. It sounded like a harmless request at the time.

A friendly five on five competition pitting the Wilmington media against members of the UNCW athletic department.

A 30 minute challenge before the Midnight Madness festivities.

No problem, right?

Well, let's just say the name of the event, "The Bumbling Basketball Bonanza" was well chosen.

Warning! Warning! Warning! Subliminal message will be appearing through out the rest of this text. Do not, I repeat do not, look directly into the print in parentheses.

Having learned of the blessed event well in advance ("The day before"), I, like the rest of my colleagues, thoroughly prepared myself for the stiff competition that lay ahead ("Got the night off from work").

The awesome media team arrived at Trask, in our matching uniforms ("T-shirt advertising everything from Bob's Bar to Silky Massage Parlor") ready for play. We took some warm-up shots ("Bricks") and went through our planned pre-game routine ("Prayer").

We ran through our precision drills like clock-work ("I.S. = lay-up"). One could tell by the tears running down our ("Of laughter") opponent's face that they feared getting on the same court as us.

The buzzer sounded to begin play. We huddled around team captain Gene Moley for some words of inspiration to take with us into battle. ("Don't Hurt Yourself")

After holding up the game for five minutes to digest these fiery words of mental support, the M-team ("Miffed, midget, media") eagerly dashed on to the court (I don't wanna play. Hey, stop peeking!).

After the jump ball, I must say we handled "muggers".

We stopped their penetration ("Oses"). We stalled their outside game ("Never"). We thoroughly confused their defense with our fancy passing ("Throw the ball to them").

Meanwhile, being as modest as I possibly could, ("Yeah, right!"), our offense was unstoppable ("Unorganized, uncoordinated, a mess").

Bill, our outside shooter, ("8 ft. feet from basket") canned the M-team's first jumper. ("Six minutes into the contest").

John Rendleman, our power forward banged the inside boards ("Missed the ball").

Goff Hart, our dominating center, used his spinning hook shot ("Air Ball") to humble his defenders.

Even I got into the act, slicing and dicing through the lane ("slipping and falling") for a pretty ("Ugly") lay-up ("Lucky!").

Then if the team got a little weary ("Every second"), our captain, Gene, ("Na, baby") would shout encouragement from the sideline ("Post someone").

As matters continue to deteriorate for us (Every second), our fearless leader would pick up the slack and play himself ("Big Minsky"). Gene showed all the rookies ("Better Players") the fine art of scoring ("We never clear"). Yes, his yellow headband ("Crazy") could be seen juking all over the court ("Staying out of the way of opponents fast break").

By halftime, we had put up some impressive numbers ("13 points").

However, we still weren't satisfied with our position ("Band between the bases") and were thirsty ("No water available") to start the second half. ("Next session").

The second half our game plan changed ("Serve 30 psi"). We also shuffled our line-up ("Anyone standing plays") trying to achieve that perfect chemistry between players on the court.

Again we provided (Student, Mole, graduate) the athletic team of Kevin Eastman, Scott Tierney, B. Ramon, Lancaster, Jeff Reynolds, and Frank Hain continuously. We showed them no mercy. (Not them us)

Personally, I played fairly well ("Stash"). I took on the big boys (Bears). I was the team defensive specialist (Can't shoot). I defended against the outside jumpers, the fast-breaks, and the dunks ("Bored, bored, BUCKETS"). I earned the athletic team respect ("Pity").

You see, the whole game the M-team had a 4-0 run, running ragged ("Boring 40 points"). However, despite not playing the A-team, we lost the ball game because of key injuries ("Too tired, Out of Shape").

The final score is essentially meaningless ("39-35"). We knew in our heart, who was the better team ("They were").

We also vowed to return with new blood ("Bored 7-0 rings") and vigor ("Satisfied oxygen tank") next year. Next year's midnight madness would be a different story ("Dunkster").

We will be ready. ("Tie the athletes")

Madness At Midnight

BY PATRICK FOWLER
Sports Editor

The Seahawk basketball season got underway on a loud note Monday evening as UNCW Seahawk fans came out to cheer the '91 men's and women's teams first organized team practice.

The event, known as Midnight Madness, was filled with cheerleaders, prize giveaways, and sideshows. It was the second time the university has held the event.

Last season, in an effort to increase home court support, men's head coach Kevin Eastman introduced the crazed pep rally event to the Seahawk faithful. Eastman had asked UNCW fans then to make Trask "... the loudest place to play in the conference."

This year's installment was runned by new UNCW athletic director Paul Miller. Miller, in his first months in the position, has been busy building a loyal Seahawk following.

"One of my main goals this year is recapturing the student body at UNCW," Miller said earlier in the year. "I want our athletic teams to have the same advantage as other schools in our league."

The festivities got underway at 9:30 p.m. with a 30-minute basketball game pitting the Wilmington media against the Athletic Department personnel. The Athletic team won the contest handily squashing the Media team, 59-25.

Charlotte band Captain Cook and the Coconut followed the basketball game playing beach and jazz numbers from Jimmy Buffet to Bonnie Raitt. Miller appeared at 11:30 p.m. introducing himself and a Seahawk promotion called the "Hawk Nest."

The Nest, a 8-ft wooden cylinder that houses a weaved-stick nest atop of it, is the new home of the UNCW mascot, the Seahawk. The bird will sit perched his nest during home games, leading the crowd in cheers.

Miller told the audience that the athletic department would pass out forty special basketball tickets with stars on them at every Seahawk basketball game. At halftime, the fortunate fans with the tickets will get to choose from forty gold keys.

Four of the keys open up the cylinder holding the Seahawk. The mascot will award each winner with a prize ranging from a boom box to a night on the town.

Miller also urged fans to register for a Jet ski. The prize will be given away at the first official Seahawk home game, Nov. 23 against Mount Olive.

The men's basketball team took the court at midnight. The '91 squad features both new and familiar faces. Seniors Mark Eaton, Matt Fish, Bryan Withers, and Kenneth Aldrich will anchor a team that consists of three freshmen, two sophomores, and three transfers playing their first year at UNCW.

Withers, a four-year starter, is a solid leaper. The senior collected 9.7 points and 4.5 rebounds last season for the Seahawks. Fish, meanwhile, has improved his game over the past four seasons. The Iowa native averaged 10 pts. and 6.8 rebounds in his junior campaign.

The women's team followed shortly after the men's introductions. The '91 squad is also deep in youth sporting only four upperclassmen. The team, which finished in the CAA cellar last season, will sorely miss seniors Tressa Reese, Kelly Kincaid, and Jennifer Benner.

Reese led the Seahawk in scoring the past four seasons, averaging over 15 pts. a game.

Senior Susan Kelly and freshman standouts Zandra Harris and Lorraine Cordaway are expected to be key leaders for coach Sheri Tynes and the Seahawks.

The Madness concluded with a 20-minute scrimmage by the men's team at 12:20 p.m.

'Hawks Trim Braves, 1-0

BY DAVE BARNHARDT
Seahawk Sportswriter

The UNCW men's soccer team squeaked a 1-0 win over Pembroke State University on Tuesday afternoon at Brooks Field. The Seahawks won the game on Peter Clay's header with 7:58 left in the game.

The win was the Seahawks' (4-5-1) fourth straight over the Braves (5-7) giving UNCW a 16-7 lead in the series.

The game featured a defensive battle as both teams struggled offensively. The Seahawks could not capitalize on their opportunities and at times appeared tired.

"We were sluggish today because we were coming off the break," coach Jackie Blackmore said. "We were fortunate to win the game."

Pembroke pressured the UNCW defense for much of the first half but were unable to get off many shots on Seahawk goalie Tom Redmond.

The Seahawks also weren't able to penetrate the Braves' goal as the half ended with scoreless tie, 0-0.

Both teams remained lethargic in the early minutes of the second half. The Seahawks offense picked up some as the half progressed. UNCW's lone score came on the Clay's header. The senior banged in the goal after the ball ricocheted off Pembroke keeper Brian Edkins hands when he reaching for a loose ball and collided with Seahawk forward Miguel Bordo. Bordo had been charging the net after the ball.

"Miguel (Bordo) deserves just as much credit on the score as I do," Clay said. "The win today was a confidence builder for us as we prepare for the conference tournament."

The Braves never seriously threatened the Seahawk's goal after the score, as UNCW picked up a much needed win.

The win was the Seahawks first in their last three tries. UNCW lost a pair of games to Colonial Athletic Association foes William and Mary and Richmond by identical 2-0 scores on Oct 4 and 6.

The Seahawks entertain North Carolina Wesleyan Sunday, Oct. 20 on Brooks Field. Game time is 2 p.m.

Junior midfielder Scott Larkins (5) prepares to slide his Pembroke defender Tuesday afternoon with the dribble. The Seahawks defeated the Braves by a 1-0 count. The win tied UNCW mark to 4-5-1 on the season.

Jim Clark's N.F.L. Picks...

Guru Sees Wins for Da Bills and Da Bears!

Week 8 of the NFL season gets underway at 7:30 tonight with the Bears and the Packers going at it on TNT's Thursday night game. Week 8 is also an off-week for Dallas, the Giants, Philadelphia, and the undefeated Redskins.

If you missed my picks for last week (and you did), I had another above .500 week. That means I'm doing better than the "experts" on ESPN. You guys know where to look now that Jimmy The Greek and the late Pete Axelholm are no longer on the air.

I'm through putting myself on the back now, and here are the picks for this week's games:

Chicago at Green Bay: Both teams are coming off an off-week and Green Bay still has no many on-field question marks. The Bears (sorry, Da Bears) come out and stop their two-game losing streak 24-14.

Atlanta at Phoenix: Will the Falcons make it two in a row? Will the Falcons' ego superinflate? Will they act like a bunch of immature jerks? Yes. Yes. Yes. 27-13.

Cleveland at San Diego: Tough game to pick because both teams are average teams. Based solely on home field advantage, I'm going with San Diego, 23-20.

Detroit at San Francisco: 6 months ago this game was a given. This week it is too. Detroit will win in dramatic fashion. Could be the best game of the year. Detroit 35-31.

Houston at Miami: An old-fashioned shootout. Houston's defense is better and more explosive. The Oilers 42-31.

Kansas City at Denver: The Chiefs showed they are the best in the AFC right now and will deflate John Elway's bubble. Chiefs 31-17.

Rams at Raiders: The Raiders got back on the winning track last week and should come into this game pumped up. Raiders 24-13. (Notice I kept away from saying L.A. world with this one!)

Minnesota at New England: Every week has a blow-out and this one's it. Vikings 35-7. N.Y. Jets at Indianapolis: O.K. every week has two. Jets 28-3.

Seattle at Pittsburgh: The Seahawks lost a tough one last week and Chuck Knox won't let this one get away. Seahawks 24-13.

Tampa Bay at New Orleans: The Saints will correct their offensive flaws this week. Saint linebackers will feast on the Bucs QB's (they will probably see two). 42-10.

Cincinnati at Buffalo: Buffalo at home has been awesome offensively, defensively they have been suspect. This could be another Monday night upset, but it won't be. Buffalo 35-27.

The Local View 400 Parking Spaces Coming

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

"There are less than 75 empty parking spaces on campus at 11:15 on Monday, Wednesday and Friday. Obviously, there is a need to build more," said R.O. Walton, vice chancellor of business affairs.

That is a reason for four hundred new parking spaces that are being built on campus.

One hundred of these spaces are currently under construction at the Madeline Suite, adjacent to Wagoner Hall. The spaces will be ready in December.

According to Walton, the spaces at the Madeline Suite will accommodate groups that meet there, such as the university's board of trustees.

Curtis Wilson, student body president, said during a speech to the Student Government Association. "They (the board of trustees) are building a lot for the big-wigs. They can't walk an extra 100 feet from the parking lot that's now 200 feet away because they're big-wigs."

Wilson learned about the parking lot at a board of trustees meeting.

The remaining 300 parking spaces will be built in the area around the University suites and residence halls to accommodate residents that presently park in lots S and T, the two lots located in front of Wagoner Hall.

"Two hundred fifty residents park in that lot. We do not want them to use the Wagoner Hall lots so they can become commuter lots," Walton said.

Walton also said, "This action is the result of a two-year-old vote by the Board of Governors, he said.

SGA senators expressed concern about the parking lots. Victor

Brown said he felt that the administration was solving one problem while creating another. One concern voiced by the senators was the number of trees that would have to be cut down and the number of trees that were cut down in the area that is under construction.

Walton said that few trees were cut down in preparation for the lot by the Madeline Suite. "That lot is being built on a fire lane. And it will be re-landscaped with hardwoods."

After a discussion at a recent meeting, the senators of the SGA voted to invite Walton to address the senate and field questions they have. Walton said that Walton would do so at the upcoming meeting on Monday.

The lot at the Madeline Suite is being built by Dickerson Carolina, Inc. Engineers are being interviewed now to design the others, Walton said.

The National View Parking Becomes A Battle

BY AMY REYNOLDS
College Press Service

They're asphalt battle zones.

Every morning, thousands of student soldiers climb into their mobile units — sporty and small, bulky and rusting — and fight for a small rectangular space defined by painted white lines.

Most lose.

Permits, tickets, fines, towed cars and just plain aggravation over this increasingly endangered species — the parking space — seem to gain more attention every year.

Because students are paying more for permits, more for parking violations and are finding fewer spaces. Administrators are looking for creative ways to curb the hue and cry and punish violators.

"We're all facing the same problems," says Sue Justen, parking division manager at the University of Washington in Seattle. "As campuses enlarge and put up additional labs, buildings, etc., they are building on their lots."

"That takes away close-up parking," she says. "And as we replace surface lots with ramps and garages, they're more expensive to people are paying more."

How much more?

That depends on the school. Here are some yearly permit prices at colleges around the country:

University of Arizona — $20 for surface lots farthest from campus; $1,325 for a "premium" reserved 24-hour spot.

University of New Mexico — general student permits are $45; $325 for reserved spots complete with your own "Reserved for (your name here)" sign.

Southeastern Louisiana University — last year's $10 permit now costs $15.

University of Nebraska at Lincoln — faculty reserved spaces (including a spot for the chancellor) are $265. Student reserved spots are $150. Remote lot permits are $10.

University of Southern Maine — most permits cost $20 for students and faculty.

Meanwhile, a large number of schools are establishing or increasing shuttle services that make for a college version of park and ride.

"A lot of our parking spaces are located on the perimeter so we found that a lot of students park there and take the shuttle onto campus," says John Henderson, administrative assistant in the Arizona parking and transportation office. "We're presently transporting over 5,000 students a week."

Arizona's shuttle service is free, as it is at Nebraska.

Nebraska recently put more emphasis on utilizing shuttle service after the university hired consultants to conduct a study of its parking situation.

"They felt that we needed to improve our shuttle service and make better use of our remote parking areas," says Ray Coffey, Nebraska's business manager and newly appointed parking administrator. "Now we're working with some very positive shuttle programs to better accommodate users."

The University of Washington is working on a program to decrease the number of cars on campus and make transportation more economical for students.

Yearly Permit Prices University of Arizona- $1325 for premium reserved...spot University of New Mexico- $325 for reserved spots

The new "U-Pass" costs students $6 a month, buying them 24-hour free access to buses, emergency rides home by taxi and night security shuttle service.

The school is also offering free parking for carpoolers and inexpensive parking tickets ($1) at up to two per week.

The regular parking rates are steadily climbing to encourage use of the new programs.

"Our stadium is built on the water. We are situated between Union Bay and Lake Washington. We're basically on a natural hourglass and there are lots of bridges," Justen says. "When school starts there is a tremendous impact on the city."

As a result, the city passed an ordinance barring the university from adding any more parking spaces. The U-Pass is partially a result of that and partially the result of successful programs elsewhere.

Another university with a problem because of its city's unique natural design is the University of Wisconsin at Madison.

Madison is an isthmus — a narrow stretch of land connecting two larger pieces of land. That has caused diminished parking space and increased headaches for everyone, both students and residents.

To park in Madison for a prolonged period of time, people purchase permits for off-street parking and for 48-hour permits in special areas.

Police are serious about enforcement.

In 1988 they issued 175,000 tickets; in 1990, 183,000 tickets. Through August, 1991, the parking division alone has issued about 100,000 tickets.

Sgt. Victor Lambert who heads parking enforcement in the traffic bureau says his unit just deals with on-street violators.

"We're very strict. We have 18 people who just give tickets," he says. In addition, another city traffic division stations officers at the city's parking garages to write tickets.

New police bicycle patrol units on some campuses are issuing more tickets, adding to the challenge students face on a daily basis.

The new obstacles aren't making students happy campers.

"All dressed up and nowhere to park," began an editorial in the Michigan State News. "No Parking" signs have become old hat and free parking spaces are rare."

Just before the University of New Mexico announced its plans to build another parking facility, an editorial in the Daily Lobo suggested eliminating reserved parking spaces for the university big shots when the state Board of Regents meets at the school.

"That would force the problem, out into the open. It would be the 'mother of all parking headaches.' It would be 'Parking Hell,' the editorial read. "If that were to happen, how long do you think it would take before parking structures began sprouting up on campus?"

Career Day 72 Companies Visit Campus

BY JENNIFER WILSON
Staff Writer

Representatives from 72 companies were in Trask Coliseum yesterday for Career Day '91. They exchanged information with students on employment opportunities, graduate and professional training, and career preparation.

James Braye, director of the Career Planning and Placement Center (the event's sponsors) said although he always wishes that more people would show up, UNCW did have a good turnout compared to other schools.

Representatives from retail, industry, graduate and professional programs, education and social services, sales and financial firms were on hand to discuss business information.

Some of the firms present were K-mart, Foot Locker, Corning Incorporated, Takeda Chemicals, Wake Forest School of Law, Wachovia Bank and Trust, and WWAY-TV.

Federal, state and local governments participated as well as the Armed Forces. This variety of companies allowed students in any major to gain information about their field. Although the annual Career Day was of immediate interest to seniors and graduate students, freshmen, sophomores and juniors were encouraged to attend. The general idea was that planning a career can never start too early and the information gained will prove to be beneficial in the future.

Braye said that his wish was for everyone to attend, no matter what year in school. "If one were to go to Career Day as a freshman and again every year after that, one would become quite sophisticated on the trends and projections of business and industry," he added.

Another reason to attend Career Day was to gain enough knowledge to someday recognize, "the job of your dreams," Braye said. Many students are unaware of certain job titles and descriptions.

Those in attendance at Career Day now have the opportunity of an early start after graduation. "It would be properly termed an information exchange," said Braye. "Conversations that begin with Career Day often lead to job interviews and eventual employment."

The Career Planning and Placement Center is located in room 106 of the University Union. It offers a variety of programs, including workshops on resume writing, job interview skills and job search strategies.

BSLN Holds Intercultural Forum

BY VONDA HONEYCUTT
Staff Writer

"It's a black thing. You wouldn't understand." Or would you? That was a point of focus for "Please Understand Me," an intercultural communication forum held last Thursday.

The forum was directed by Cathy Birmingham, assistant director for leadership, and Linda MacRae, of the department of education. It was sponsored by the Black Student Leadership Network. The forum featured a board of professors and students.

The professors included: Dr. Deborah Andrews, Dr. James Sabella, and Dr. Carolyn Simmons. The student board included: Ziggy Nix, Ken Lemon, Shannon Jones and Alden Blake.

The forum began with a videotape on stereotyping, which portrayed the ways that some people feel about certain terms used to describe them. It then continued with discussions of problems and possible solutions by the professor and student boards. The program ended with an in-depth discussion and statements with and by the audience.

One popular topic of the forum was common negative stereotypes. A few were used frequently. If one lives in the country, one's a farmer or stupid. If one is Italian, then the mafia is involved. If one is African-American, then one may be "uppity". If you are African-American, then you are meeting a scholarship requirement. If there is a gay person present, one should not bend over. The amount of these references could continue on indefinitely.

One student believed, "we live a tendency of segregating ourselves." Another student discussed nonverbal communication.

There was a discussion involving the t-shirts bearing the message, "It's A Black Thing. You Wouldn't Understand." Many white students were confused about the meaning of these shirts and couldn't understand why students would want to wear them.

One student said, "African-Americans are separating themselves from the rest of the many cultures represented." One student said she felt that, "we have no common ground." In response, another student said the shirts have a culturally based meaning, that a white or a member from another ethnic group probably would not understand, but if the person

Ruby Brown, publicity and correspondence chair-person for BSLN, said, "Based on the great turnout and receptive participation, the students, both black and white, are aware that there is a problem of racial tension due to lack of knowledge of other cultures. The students are aware that changes need to be made within themselves and this can be accomplished by becoming more aware of other cultures."

Discover Backpacks At A Glance. . .

BY DANA HOWARD
DISCOVER Outdoor Leadership Program

The DISCOVER Outdoor Leadership Program's 2nd annual fall break backpacking trip took place in Shining Rock Wilderness, located in the mountains of the Pisgah National Forest. The group of ten was quite varied, as it included freshmen, seniors, graduates, faculty, and everyone in between. The drive was eight hours in which the group got to know one another by sharing camping stories and jokes. At the trail head the route was decided, a lesson on map and compass use was given for the lesser experienced camper, and they were off.

The fall foliage was almost at its peak and the weather was great: next to cloudless, warm days and cool nights with an endless view of stars. The trip was 15 miles long, covering a varied terrain which included, rocks, stream, and fields. There were several occasions where campers and wildlife met too. On Friday night, at the top of Shining Rock, the group beckoned a band of skunks by unwillingly leaving dirty pots and pans around the campsite. Luckily, the skunks came in peace and were warded off without incident. And so ends another DISCOVER adventure.

If you have ever wanted to "get back to nature", but just didn't know where to start, DISCOVER is your chance! The DISCOVER Outdoor Leadership Program gives students, faculty, and staff an excellent opportunity to experience the outdoors as a beautiful and safe environment.

SOVIET NATIONAL TO SPEAK

Soviet Scientist Dr. Vsevolod A. Marinov will speak tonight at 8 p.m. in Cameron Auditorium as a part of UNCW's recognition of United Nations Day.

Marinov will speak on his involvement in the failed coup attempt in the Soviet Union, as well as other topics relating to the state of that nation.

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL CHAPTER FORMING!

The largest and oldest human rights organization in the world is in the process of forming a chapter here at UNCW. Amnesty works on the behalf of political prisoners around the world, by petitioning government officials in different countries for their release and for better care when abuse is suspected. There will be an interest meeting Wed. Oct. 30 in Room 201 of the University Union. For further info call Denny Best 343-9827 or Arin Anderson 791-1902. Another Sailing Trip! Friday, October 25th 1:30-5:30 p.m. If you've missed the chance before, don't lose out on this one. It's free and fun and gives you a chance to see Wrightsville Beach from the ocean side. Come by Alternative! (UU 104) to sign up.

EMPLOYEES OF THE MONTH

The University Union and University Center would like to congratulate the student employees of the month for September, Jessica Bullard and Charlie Davis. They have performed exceptional work to earn this honor.

ORIENTATION LEADER SELECTION PROCESS IS UNDERWAY

The Orientation Leader selection process is underway. Applications are available through November 1 at the Residence Life Activities Center, the University Union Information Center, and the office of the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs (Alderman Hall 101). The application deadline is 5:00 p.m. on November 1. Interviews will take place November 4-November 21. The new 1992 Student Orientation Leaders will be notified prior to Thanksgiving break. Energetic, dedicated, and outgoing students are encouraged to apply.

CANOEING THE SALT MARSH

Join the Aquarium staff on November 1, 1991 from 9:00 am till noon for an exploration into the salty marshes south of Fort Fisher.

Highlights include fantastic bird watching and spectacular views of the Lower Cape Fear Estuary. Bring a snack lunch, wear appropriate clothing and shoes for canoeing. The Aquarium will provide everything else.

To register or for more information about this and other dynamic programs at the Aquarium call the Aquarium Education Office at (919) 458-7468.

SERIES ON COLUMBUS

Dr. Andrew Clark, assistant professor of history, will speak on "The African Discovery of Europe and the Americans" as part of the History Departments series of talks on Columbus and the Age of Discovery October 28 at 7:30 p.m. in Bryan Auditorium, Morton Hall. Free and open to the public.

S.N.C.A.E.

The S.N.C.A.E. will be having a Pizza Break "Mixer" on Wednesday, October 30 from 5:30 - 6:30 p.m. in King Auditorium. All members are encouraged to come and meet other future educators. We will be discussing the groups future goals and projects. Bring a friend! (Sign up in King Hall at the S.N.C.A.E. bulletin board).

HALLOWEEN MOONLIGHT RUN

The athletic department will host the 2nd annual Halloween Moonlight Run on campus Saturday night starting at 8:30 p.m. with a one mile fun run and will feature an 8,000 meter race at 9:00 p.m. A Halloween costume contest will be held. T-shirts, awards, prizes and a great post race party will be held in Trask Coliseum. Runners may sign up Saturday night in the Trask lobby. The race will be run entirely on campus starting and finishing at Trask Coliseum. For more information contact, Bill Cason at 395-3889.

GHOST STORIES

ACE will present folksinger and storyteller John Golden on Wednesday October 30, in Center Stage. He will perform folksongs and tell Carolina Ghost Stories between midnight and 1. Some of the stories he will perform include Devil's Tramping Ground, and Light at Macco Station. He started singing and playing guitar during the folk music awakening in the late Fifties, but his songwriting (with Rob Nathanson) is a recent venture that resulted in three albums (BALLADS, LOST IN THE ISLANDS AND RHUMBS OF THE WIND) being released by Twin Oaks Studios since 1984.

PREREQUISITION FOR MAT 111

Students who plan to preregister for MAT 111 Spring 1992 must have a satisfactory, up-to-date (less than 1 Year old) by January 13, 1992 UNCW Mathematics Placement Test score before you preregister. If you do not have a satisfactory score or your score is out of date, then you must take the placement test. Call the Mathematical Sciences Department, ext. 3290, to schedule a time to take this test before you preregister. Those who sign up for the course without satisfying this prerequisite will be dropped from the course.

PARENT TO PARENT

UNCW is one of five sites to broadcast a dynamic video-based workshop designed to help young people avoid drug problems by training their parents and teachers in the knowledge, skills, attitude, and abilities necessary to guide children through the high risk years.

The workshop, "Parent to Parent" will be delivered in a unique video/audio network that connects groups at five sites in the county and offers one continuing education unit. The sessions, to be held in the fiber optics classroom on the second floor of Randall Library, will run from 4:51:15 p.m. on Tuesdays and Thursdays, October 29-November 26. To register, call the Division for Public Service at 3195.

Big Parking Problems Require New Solutions

Considering the lack of parking spaces on campus during peak usage hours, it seems odd that the university is spending limited funds for parking by Wagoner Hall.

Student Body President Curtis Wilson reported to the SGA Senate that parking near Madeline Suite (located inside of Wagoner Hall) is to accommodate "big-wigs" who visit campus for various functions. In many cases, these functions have little to do with student life. Neither will the new parking lot.

Making the walk to Madeline Suite less taxing for campus visitors shouldn't be a priority, considering the present situation.

The administration of this university should be looking into alternative ways of dealing with parking problems on this campus. Instead of building more parking lots in the back forty of campus, maybe we should look into restricting parking on campus, or structuring parking fees to vary with the location of certain parking lots.

Or maybe more wide-sweeping plans should be adopted. The university has grown to a point where we should be looking into improved transportation systems both on and off of campus. Students who live close to campus should be able to have several options for transport to campus, rather than having to drive their cars every day.

If these measures were implemented, eliminating parking for freshmen or other student groups wouldn't constitute the nightmare which it currently does.

One thing is for sure. The parking situation at UNCW probably won't get any better without some changes. Building new parking lots in back of campus will only provide a short-term solution.

A Word About Letters

As you can read from the owner's box at the top of this page, letters to the editor are edited for space and clarity. Who decides what needs editing? Of course, we do.

Edward Chaffin wrote a letter last week which he claims was over-edited. While he says the content of the letter was not changed, he argues that the effect that he was trying to achieve was destroyed. That may be true.

After all, our purpose at The Seahawk is to present ideas in as clear a manner as possible. That may have to be accomplished at the expense of some flowery writing.

So, just to set the record straight — Edward Chaffin's letter was edited and was changed to adhere to the editorial standards of The Seahawk, just as nearly every letter to the editor is.

Letters To The Editor Health & Wellness Needs Work

Dear Editor,
I am writing in regard to the Health and Wellness Center on campus. It is my feeling that they are not doing an appropriate job of aiding the UNCW students. I have tried to get help from them three times this year. Maybe being a freshman, I am just not used to this kind of medical care, but it is my feeling that I should get medical attention when it is necessary and not when it is convenient for everyone else.

I, as well as many other students, have been denied medical attention when it was necessary. Excuses have been a lack of time, as well as not having an available doctor to treat a sprained ankle. It is understandable that there are other students on campus with medical problems, but the inability of the Health and Wellness to see me poses inconveniences such as, missing classes and not being able to find a ride back to Health and Wellness.

Another time that I tried to get an appointment with them, I was told that I had to come back the next day because there was no one that could see me; they were all busy at the Health Fair. Yes, preventiveness is important, but that can wait. My present well-being is important too.

One last reason that reacted in my writing this complaint was when a friend of mine called to make a GYN appointment and was told that they were not making that type of appointment for two weeks. She was referred to the New Hanover County Health Department, but we shouldn't have to spend our tuition money to go to a health department. That was a big inconvenience to her. She had to decide between missing classes or waiting to get an appointment, possibly causing major medical problems later in life.

A Student Health and Wellness Center is a necessity on college campuses but, when they are not providing appropriate services to the students on that campus, not only is it an inconvenience, but it is a waste of our money. Therefore, it is my feeling that the UNCW campus needs to drastically improve the way that it operates its Health and Wellness facilities.

Phil Smith Didn't Analyze

Dear Editor,
Phil Smith's "analysis" of the Thomas confirmation hearings in the October 17, 1991 issue of The Seahawk was anything but analysis. The writer presents Seahawk readers with nothing analytical; instead he offers his opinion that the hearings were "a mockery of our easily and quite often mocked system."

Unfortunately, he never bothers to tell readers what evidence he has to justify this

The Black Perspective with Pamela Wall

Black Colleges Don't Want Segregation

I begin this week's article on the Black Perspective with an apology and a word of thanks. To those readers who searched the newspaper for my column and did not find it, I apologize for that. In studying for this class and that test I did not schedule the time to do the work necessary for the Black Perspective. I have been negligent in my duties and I am really sorry. I think it is pretty safe to say that I will be more responsible toward you in the near future.

I wish to thank those who approached me about the first article and gave me good responses. The praises, the accolades and the comments have really encouraged me and are greatly appreciated. And besides, it is just good manners to say "thank you" if someone does something nice for you. So again, thanks.

Now, for this week's Black Perspective. I bet you are wondering, "What is that female up to this week?" My thought for this week was spurred by Seahawk editor-in-Chief David Burke's article entitled "Cartoon Raises Racial Questions on Campus." The article discussed how a cartoon appearing in the Sept. 17th Raleigh News and Observer caused a small stir at a recent SGA meeting. I do not wish to describe the cartoon in detail since David Burke did a good job doing so. When I pick up a newspaper about Oliver North, I am not given every detail of the Iran-Contra Scandal. The writers assume I know. So for that reason I am not going to rehash the whole incident. (If you are totally in the dark, refer to Sept. 17th RNO, page 8-A and Sept. 26th Seahawk.)

When I first saw the cartoon I was going to write a Black Perspective with a funny-black attitude with much neck rollin', lip smacking, and finger popping. The associate editor of RNO, Steve Ford stated and I paraphrase, that the drawing portrayed what they see as a movement on black campuses toward re-segregation. I am amazed that when a predominantly white campus keeps attracting white students (even with the recommended 10% minority requirement) nobody gives it a second thought. When a predominantly black school wants to keep attracting black students it is called a movement toward re-segregation. Simply amazing.

The part of the cartoon that really galled me was when they had a brother in the back of the bus say "come on back where it's comfy, Bro!" The Montgomery bus boycott is not exactly ancient history. People can still remember when riding in the back of the bus was a common and embarrassing occurrence of everyday life. To include an event in a cartoon that blacks like to forget and then make light of it, is low. Then, back to the black man's comment...Please tell me who wants to be uncomfortable, huh? In PSY 105, we learn about Maslow's hierarchy of needs, in which safety and security needs have to be met in order to advance to a higher level of needs. The safety and security needs deal with being hungry and getting food, with getting TLC and being what, uncomfortable? The cartoonist struck at a need that is basic to all humans and not peculiar only to the black race.

When a black person attends a HBCU (historically black college-university), the faculty understands that the black student needs not only a classroom where the academic potential is brought out but, also an educational setting outside the classroom where a black student can thrive. The faculty understands the barriers that beset black students having been through the fire themselves and can readily identify with their students. In a predominantly white school there are support systems that cater to white students, rapport between them and the faculty, and a rigorous course of study. In a HBCU support systems exist for black students, and there is excellent rapport between them and the faculty, and a course of study very rigorous and very equitable to any other school.

Inherent in this society is the notion that a HBCU education is inferior to that of a historically white college. WRONG! HBCU's have turned out Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., Jesse Jackson, Dr. W.E.B. DuBois, Mary McLeod Bethune, and Thurgood Marshall to name a few. All of these individuals were active participants in society, won prestigious awards, conversed with heads of state and conspired presidents. Good groovy—Spike Lee is a Morehouse male. AND HBCU's are responsible for 40% of the degrees earned by blacks.

I speak in generalities in this piece because there is so much present on HBCU's. Not only does Ebony and Black Enterprise delve into these topics but, Black Issues in Higher Education devotes much literature about this and other relevant subjects. So I urge you to go to the library and do some reading and see you next time when we discuss Blacks in Politics.

What's Going On In Yugoslavia?

BY BRADLEY SEKULICH
Contributing Writer

Why is Croatia at war? Is this war just another bloody example of Balkan ethnic hatred getting out of hand, or is there a deeper reason than a settling of ethnic grudges that compels the combatants?

In this case it seems that the age-old hatred between the Croats and the Serbians is being all too often misunderstood as the reason for the fighting.

On June 25th of this year Croatia and Slovenia declared their independence from Yugoslavia. Both republics elected democratic forms of government in last winter's elections. These elections brought the two republics into ideological conflict with Serbia, Yugoslavia's largest and most politically dominant republic. Serbia's break with communism was in the form of an elected socialist government, headed by the same communist party boss, Slobodan Milosevic.

On top of differing political ideologies, Croatia was also moved to independence by economic concerns. As the second most economically prosperous republic in Yugoslavia, (second to Slovenia) Croatia was exporting 8 percent of its gross national product beyond its borders annually. The colonies of the United States were only giving up five percent of their G.N.P. to the British when they decided to declare independence. Remember "taxation without representation"? Considering Serbia's blockage of a Croatian (Stipe Mesic) turn as federal president earlier in the year, it would be hard to argue that the Croatian people were being fairly represented by the government that their taxes were helping to support.

Since the war began the Serbs and their allies have totally usurped federal authority, not to mention anything at this point.

O.K. Croatia felt economically and politically not to mention culturally and religiously at odds with Yugoslavia and decided to declare independence. So why the war?

It seems that Slobodan Milosevic and the Serbian dominated federal army decided that Croatia's 12 percent Serbian minority were in danger of "physical liquidation" by the Croats. It was decided that the federal army, along with the Serbian guerrillas, would use its 10 to 1 firepower advantage to liberate these people. How destroying village after village of Croats and attacking civilian population centers will liberate these people is as of yet unclear.

Incidentally Lilosevic used this same claim of protecting a Serb minority to establish a firm federal control in Kosovo last year. This trumping up of already existing ethnic tensions has served to take away from the purposes of the Croats' desire for independence.

Croats are seeking independence and self-determination through the democratic process. They see the federal government of Yugoslavia as nothing but a bankrupt institution catering to the desires of a land hungry, economically depressed Serbia, and they want no more part of it. As long as this war is seen as only another clash between old ethnic rivals, the possibility of stopping the bloodshed remains slim. The next time you see a Croat on the news saying, "We will fight until we win or die," you can believe "winning" means an independent Croatia, not a high Serbian body count.

And Now A Word From Our...

show?

The first one to come to mind is the "Canoe" spot where some guy on a boat is signaling for a babe on another boat to come over so he can introduce himself carnally. She does, but it's too late for her now. Little did she realize, the cute guy is none other than Ted Bundy (Al's brother), and now she is feeding the blues in the Gulf Stream.

Another that comes to mind is the "Hardie's" spot glorifying the work ethic of its employees. Given the work ethics of most Americans, I question that of those that work fast food. I figure in the facts, that these people have to be at work at 4:30 and are working for minimum wage. I know what kind of rear-end I can be just getting up for an 8 o'clock class, let alone a 4:30 job. Chyeah, I want to buy biscuits from these guys. Can't you just see the ingredients. Flour, milk, rapoison, arsenic, old lace, sugar, crack, and butter.

Like most college students I run out of money on a regular basis (weekly) and am tempted by Mr. Cash and his offer of a loan. Unfortunately, I don't own a home. The way I understand it, he will lend you money, you pay it back or lose your house. Why don't they interview some of the people who are now back in a trailer or apartment after Mr. Cash played Repoman on them. I doubt Mr. Cash would come across as such a nice guy after that.

Remember, the next time you see a commercial, how much money went into making it and presenting an inviting product, then remember there is always an ominous side they are afraid you'll discover (Sounds like Stephen King's next plot).

Phillip Loughlin Euthanasia Should Be Legal

My father scared the hell out of me once when I was much younger. He told me that he wanted me, instead of putting him in a nursing home when he got too old, to take him out in the woods and shoot him. With this memory in mind, an interesting bill is on the ballot in Seattle, Washington this year. The voters will decide whether to allow elderly people or the terminally ill to kill themselves.

The idea is not a bad one. This may seem a cold view, but given the treatment of invalids and the elderly in today's society, it may be more humane than it sounds. Several states now recognize the living will, in which a person states that he would like to be removed from life support if an accident should leave him in a vegetative state. This saves the relatives from possible financial ruin along with mental anguish as they watch a loved one rot alive in a hospital bed—while the doctor's meter keeps right on running. The euthanasia bill would basically be an extension of the same thing.

I understand now what my dad meant, and I share his feeling. I have often stated that I have no desire to live beyond a point where I can no longer feed myself. I have no desire to be a burden or a hassle to my family or anyone else. Some folks might argue that caring for an invalid should be no burden to loving family members. I'm sure that explains the over-crowded nursing homes. No, even a saint would grow resentful of someone who will forever demand complete care. It is not like caring for a child who will someday grow up to be independent. It is a matter of taking care of someone who is only going to grow more dependent until they die.

Another reason I would not want to outlive my physical usefulness is that it would involve a complete loss of my dignity. That noble coward John Falsvri once quipped that honor is little more than a nice epitaph. I would rather have a nice epitaph than have some stranger daily changing my soiled sheets, washing my shriveled an impotent body, wheeling me out to sit feeble in the sun, and feeding me from a spoon. I do not want to be a barely living husk, with my mind or imagination, and find it wrong that I may be forced to do so.

There is a reasonable argument against euthanasia. There may one day be a cure for the patient's ailment. It may be premature to allow someone to die just because there is no existing cure for whatever is wrong. With medical progress, there is always the chance that a new discovery may be just around the corner. In some few cases, that may be true. I think, though, it should be a personal choice whether to cash in the chips against the possibility of getting better.

Some illnesses may always be incurable. Others may be so painful that it is not worth the wait. Some examples might be brain injuries, AIDS, and some forms of cancer. Likewise, I do not believe there will ever be a cure for old age (nor should there be). In fact, I think medical science has overstepped its bounds in keeping humans alive longer than is natural. People are supposed to die when they are weak, just as weak animals in the wild will not survive.

Death from disease and age is a natural way of maintaining a reasonable population. Science has disrupted that scheme. I firmly believe that overpopulation is one of the main causes of social problems in the U.S. today. Too many people in a small area, like too many rats in a cage, will begin to prey on one another. Every time some force is introduced to reduce the population, science finds a way to overcome it.

While allowing elderly and terminally ill people to die by choice will probably not appreciably reduce the population, it will be a move in the right direction. As the idea gains acceptance, more people will take the option. This will open the doors for euthanasia supporters to move into the realm of comatose or vegetative patients who will likely never have a chance of recovery to a fulfilling life.

The rationale for this is both sentimental and economic. There is nothing so devastating as watching the hopes of a vegetative child's parents rise, only to be shattered as yet another experiment fails. They are strapped onto an emotional roller coaster and the doctors and lawmakers are at the controls.

This is not to blame the doctors. We cannot blame them for the fact that the bills keep rolling in, regardless of the fact that these cases are usually hopeless. Someone has to pay for the care. These payments usually far exceed the resources available to the parents or family.

The decision to stop life support is not an easy one, and I hope I never find myself in a position to make it. Still, that decision should be an option that is open. I have to sympathize with the people who have had to fight long court battles because the law requires them to keep riding that roller coaster and to keep paying the bills. Imagine fighting in court to have your loved one killed and hearing over and over the same arguments you have had with yourself a million times before.

To digress just a little; I want also to address the method of euthanasia. When a person on life support is allowed to die, it is usually by removing the system and allowing what amounts to starvation and dehydration. I think this is wrong and cruel. Instead, a drug should be injected into the I.V. tubes that will make the last minutes pleasant, just in case there is any awareness left in the patient. I am not a doctor, but there must be some opiate which will kill without pain or fear. If euthanasia of the elderly or terminally ill becomes legal, this consideration will be even more important.

What the argument finally boils down to is that we should be prepared to be responsible for our own lives, and by implication, our own deaths. Most of us will probably die a more or less timely death. Those of us who don't should think ahead to a time when a decision will be necessary. Hopefully, that decision will be ours to make.

Animals Are Getting Crazy

Concerned? You bet we are concerned, here at the Bureau of Fish and Game Acting Weird. Our first inkling of trouble was when alert reader John Wilkinson sent us this news item from the Italy news roundup in a newspaper called The European:

"Carmen Malavasi, 54, was riding her moped alongside a canal in Suzzara, Milan, when a huge carp leapt out of the water and hit her in the face. She lost control of the moped and ran into a car, which crashed into a lamppost. Both she and the car driver were taken to hospital."

This is chilling news, because until now the carp has been considered a friend to man. There are many recorded instances wherein a swimmer was drowning, and along came a carp, which realized what was happening and swam off to get help. Of course within seconds the carp completely forgot its mission; we're talking about animals with the brainpower of cashews. But at least they never did any actual harm, until this moped incident.

You are saying: "Yes, but that was just one Italian carp, probably acting on its own or at most with one or two accomplices." Well perhaps you will change your tune when you read the following news item from The Times of London, sent in by several alert readers concerning an incident in the town of Walthamstow, England:

"A fish breeder watched in dismay as the beautiful Koi carp, swimming gracefully in his garden pond, began blowing up, scattering multicolored scales all over his garden."

The breeder suspects that the carp were affected by a chemical in the pond. His wife is quoted as saying: "It sounds crazy, but they literally exploded, leaving lumps of fish all around the pond."

Your natural reaction, of course, is: "What is this chemical, and why don't we put some in the U.S. House of Representatives swimming pool?"

No! Your reaction is to realize that, according to Newton's Theory of Evolution, the next logical development is carp that can both leap AND explode. This is especially alarming in light of the fact that many hotels now have decorative carp ponds in their lounge areas. It's only a matter of time before a sales professional, unwinding after a hard day by trying to grope the cocktail waitress, is reduced to thousands of tiny professional shards by a pond-to-air Scud-Carp. Granted, he will have deserved it, but innocent furniture could be damaged.

And as if that isn't enough, we also have this situation with the alcoholic marmots. We refer to a news report from The Fresno Bee, written by Gene Rose and sent in by many alert readers, headlined: MARMOTS GETTING HIGH ON COOLANT. The article states that the marmots, which are members of the ground-squirrel family that look kind of like Walter Cronkite, have been gnawing through car radiator hoses so they can drink the ethylene glycol coolant and get snookered.

"The marmots have apparently become ethylene glycol junkies," a wildlife biologist is quoted as saying.

X X X
WARNING TO YOUNG PEOPLE: DO NOT try this yourself. For one thing, radiator hoses are very hard on your teeth.

X X X
Any police officer will tell you there's no point in trying to reason with drunk marmots. The best way to handle them, in our opinion, would be hire Gay Balfour of Cortez, Colo., who has invented a machine that sucks prairie dogs out of the ground.

We're not making this up, either. Prairie dogs are little underground rodents that look kind of like Walter Cronkite and are sometimes considered a hard-to-get-rid-of nuisance. So Mr. Balfour invented his vacuum machine, which was the subject of a Denver Post article, sent in by many alert readers, featuring a photo of a man sticking a fat hose into the ground and vacuuming prairie dogs into a huge yellow contraption. The article, written by Kit Miniclier, states that this is a harmless procedure wherein the prairie dogs "are literally sucked out of their homes into a roaring 300 mph wind tunnel and deposited inside a truck with hundreds of their equally bewildered colleagues."

This procedure would definitely sober up the marmots. But the question we must ask ourselves, as ecologists and animal-rights activists, is: Would it also work on our son? We're thinking about the problem of getting him up for school. This is very difficult because he is held down by the strongest force on Earth, Bed Gravity, which renders him incapable of doing anything except shout, "I AM getting up!" every five minutes. He can keep this up for hours. Vacuum power could be the answer.

Us: Robert! Get up RIGHT NOW!

Robert: I AM get ...

Vacuum:

WHOOOOOOOMMM

Millisecons later our son, traveling at 300 mph and looking like Walter Cronkite, would arrive at the breakfast table. Wouldn't that be great, parents? It would mean a brighter future for us all, unless we are killed by carp. Pass the radiator hose.

How Does One Escape Reality? Get Slap-Happy

BY ZACHARY BISACKY
Entertainment Writer

For the first hour of The Fisher King, I wondered why I had chosen this film instead of the other playing at College Road Cinemas. Maybe it was the excellent reviews it had received, or perhaps it was because The Fisher King was impressively named the week's top money-maker. Indeed, these attributes were reason enough, but in addition, how could I be disappointed with such luminary actors as Jeff Bridges and Robin Williams? Unfortunately, with a script as dull and jumbled as The Fisher King, it wasn't hard.

Once again, Monty Python animator Terry Gilliam works on the motif paralleled in all his other films (Time Bandits, Brazil, and The Adventures of Baron Munchausen), and that is, how does one escape a reality that is filled with tragedy and despondent bureaucratic life, without getting slap-happy every night? Imagination is Gilliam's answer and it is typified quite extraordinarily by his bizarre images he uses to transform New York City into a haven for flame-throwing knights on horseback. His stage setting within the city is remarkable, but jarring leaps in the narrative suggest that more of the money should have been spent on the script than on the set.

In this tragic comedy, Williams plays a homeless man named Parry, who, in his dreamworld envisions himself and his fellow street people as benevolent knights in search of the Holy Grail. He thinks the Grail resides in the house of billionaire Langdon Carmichael, but it is actually an outdated bowling trophy (one of the witty twists in the movie). In reality, Parry is a former medieval history professor who slipped into his own private fantasy world after his wife was murdered. The knight that haunts him is a reminder of dreadful reality and a symbol of her death.

Parry's liberator is Jack Lucas (Jeff Bridges), a loud-mouthed, arrogant DJ, who's career shatters when an on-air comment provokes a listener to randomly shoot a cafe full of people. Jobless, Lucas spends the following year boozing it up at the apartment of his girlfriend, Anne (Mercedes Ruehl), who gives him everything. The dynamic performance given by Ruehl enables Bridges to overcome his usually dull acting, however, his lack of wit remains.

Despite Anne's support, Jack considers suicide by jumping into the East River, until Parry and his pack of bums come to the rescue. Instead of Williams delivering his usual gut-busting monologue, he sings a parody of "How About You?" that had me verify my watch's accuracy. Unfortunately, he tries again, this time by expressing bowel movement, and instead of laughing, I found myself questioning if Robin Williams had left all his comical talent at home.

When Williams tries to incorporate his whimsical comedy routine into the role as a history teacher, the story loses a sense of structure and cohesion. The movie's hollow feeling is additionally heightened by a torrent of awkward transitions and plots. Jack tries to lessen Parry's loss by helping unite him with his dream girl, a blundering office worker named Lydia (Amanda Plummer). After strong coercion, Lydia and Jack find themselves double-dating with Anne and Jack. Here, through uniting these four dissimilar persons in a Chinese restaurant, the film is finally able to produce some warm and funny scenes.

Just as things start to tail with the linking of these two mis-matched romantics, reality bursts in. The couples become separated, Jack returns to the radio business and Parry's imaginary knight reappears. The film might have had more verve if it had ended here, but it doesn't. Gilliam drags us through another half-hour of anti-climatic scenes that conclude with everyone happy, except the viewer. As if this wasn't bad enough, when the lights in the theater came on, a couple stood kissing, and I thought how wrong I was to believe popular, contemporary films could still provide an escape from reality.

After The Fisher King, getting slap-happy didn't sound like a bad idea.

The Fifty-Cent Draft Looking Created Atmosphere Good Under Wraps

BY JEFF NELSON
Entertainment Writer

It was Saturday night. In fact, it was a fairly lukewarm Saturday night as BRICKBAT took the stage of Jacob's Run in a blur of fast paced, guitar oriented, get-off music, that made the evening anything but lukewarm.

Once again, the crowd at Jake's saw BRICKBAT, a local Wilmington band, upstage their Raleigh (or maybe it's Chapel Hill) contemporaries, ERECTUS MONOTONE. The boys from BRICKBAT blitzkrieged their way through as hour long set that included mostly originals like "Ode To A Suckdog" and "Thrashing Cup". Even their covers carried an overt twist of originality as KISS' "Detroit Rock City" became "Detroit Pork City."

The festive nature of the show was enhanced by the fifty-cent draft special, and the occasional sloppy drunk spilling beer on the band. By the time ERECTUS MONOTONE mounted the stage it was nearly 12:30 and the crowd was more than ready for some more music.

In all fairness to the band, the ERECTUS MONOTONE crew put down a good show. I remember loud, fast, and more: loud. Yet their performance paled in comparison to the energy that erupted from the opening band's speaker stacks, causing them to fall somewhat short of a truly invigorating show.

But wait. Surprise, surprise, as half-way through the ERECTUS set, Wilmington's adopted son, Chad Heye (pronounced Hi), leaped on the stage in a burst of spontaneity spurred on by the intro of the GERM's tune, "Lexicon Double". To the crowd's delight, Chad belted out the lyrics, and then continued for a few minutes with some Jim Morrison type rhetoric.

After all was said and done, I came away from Jacob's Run with my taste for music fully satisfied. A hardy-har-har to both BRICKBAT and ERECTUS MONOTONE for a show well done.

"I think that [film's] potential is enormous, but I have a prejudice against them, which is that it deals with our most infantile side. A baby a month old can lie in a bed looking up and follow images. And I think that that's the way we approach movies."

Hey Kids, Let's Go Buffalo Hunting

I asked my fellow workers if they would rather read about Maria Maples and the Donald, or an outrageous piece on David Lynch's Wild at Heart, now arousing a cult-like following on video release. When they realized I would be writing it, well, their responses were less than enthusiastic about either one, but that's beside the point. I, after all, am the one and only "Fluff Meister" and get paid big money to make these kind of momentous decisions. ("Yeah...Right!")

Want to go Buffalo hunting in the Wizard of Oz with Elvis? You can if you rent David Lynch's Wild at Heart, a film destined to become a favorite in the Helms household. I must warn you (and Jesse) it is graphically sordid explicitly... weird.

Lynch, who wrote and directed Wild at Heart, is one of those true visionaries who make you worry about the future, and with good reason. Lynch has the uncanny ability to reach into our souls and pull out our deepest, darkest secrets and fears. He then goes one step further and exploits them, if only to show us how silly we are for letting them inhibit us.

The opening of the film seems campy, like a bad soap opera, and you wonder how you are ever going to sit through the rest of it. But trust me, because a Fluff Meister knows these things, by the end you will be mesmerized, not to mention slightly confused, which, I think, is the way Lynch likes it. He may want to intimidate you into thinking it's all very artsy and obscure beyond hope of explanation, but don't let him. There are things in this film that I defy Lynch to explain.

Nicolas Cage gives an engaging performance with his own entrancing quirky style, and a snarl that even the King would be proud of, mama. I ask you, who else could play such a character who stops a heavy-metal band in mid-song, defends his girl's honor, and then breaks into a sticky sweet love song? (If you think there's is no humor, or symbolism in this film, you're just not paying attention. Are you paying attention, Jesse?) And this is the least of his talents, for he can make his girlfriend "hotter than Georgia asphalt" and then "take her to the edge". (Oh boy, better get Jesse a cup of water.)

Laura Dern, who has just recently stated that the contemplated briefly on becoming a nun, does some rather "un-nun-like" activities, exhibiting her attraction for Cage's character so graphically that it would have Jesse running for that VCR eject button.

If you thought Twain Peaks was odd, well, it doesn't hold a candle to Wild at Heart. Those hip kids who religiously watched the show will notice numerous cameos of actors from the series. Including, "Laura Palmer" who is alive and well as the good witch who delivers the moral of the story, complete with a magic wand. (Can we guess who the bad witch is?)

If you like movies that make you contemplate, then Wild at Heart will do more than that. It will make you question Lynch's motives. Lynch calls 'em like he sees 'em, and he has obviously seen some pretty weird things.

If you have any question call up Jesse. He and Lynch are so alike, it's scary. "Yeah...Right!"

One-Man Play On Tennessee Williams To Be Presented

Opera House Theatre will present Confessions of a Nightingale by Charlotte Chandler and Ray Strickland.

This one-man show centers on Tennessee Williams, one of the greatest playwrights of the 20th century, and his flamboyantly individual private life.

David Parker (pictured) will portray Williams as the playwright discusses his family, early struggles, his successes and the price of fame in a delightfully witty style.

Directed by Anthony Pender, the production will be staged in Thalian Hall Studio Theatre from Wednesday, October 30-November 3. For ticket reservations call 763-3398. All performances are at 8:00 p.m.

Shasta McAllister, Election Board Chairman

This is the first year that Shasta has worked with the Student Government Association at UNCW, but she was quite active with the SGA at the college she transferred from. Shasta is presently working on a survey for the student body about SGA. This will be used to gain feedback about our government and find out what needs improvement. Shasta has a personal goal of wanting to make all elections run smoothly for candidates, students (voters), and her committee. She also wants to get more students involved with voting and make SGA respected and looked up to.

Shasta feels that if students aren't aware about SGA, it is because they don't read the paper / posters, and pay attention to their surroundings. "Please read the Seahawk when it comes out, especially about SGA Events and get involved! It's well worth it!!"

Cathy Birmingham, SGA Liaison

Cathy has served for over two years as SGA liaison. During this time she has advised the Student Government Association Executive Board. She has established the tradition of having a retreat each semester to help Senators learn to work together. She has also worked with the Executive Board in getting the officers to cooperate, share information, and support each other.

In the future, she would like each standing committee of SGA (Budget and Planning, Constitution, and Judiciary) to have an advisor to provide support and continuity.

"I think the SGA is on the way to strengthening committees and encouraging each member to be active. The SGA Update, and other promotional items have really helped," Birmingham said.

Police Chief Wadman Welcomed

Last Thursday, the Student Government Association had a reception for the new Police Chief of the City of Wilmington, Robert C. Wadman. Line Dempsey, Public Information Officer, organized the reception and said that he was pleased with the turnout. "I was really happy to see many prominent faculty members, and a large number of students in attendance." Freshman Sarah McKeon was impressed with initiative SGA has taken to involve the university with the community. "It's great to see students take such an interest in the outside community."

The purpose of the reception was to help build relations between the community and the students. "We have over 8,000 students here at UNCW this semester, and at least 6,000 of them are commuters and live in the city and neighboring areas. Because of this factor, UNCW is a major part of the community," Dempsey added.

Do you know who represents you, and your class?

A Proposal That Is Not Well-Timed

Proposition 38. Memorize this number, you'll hear it more than once in the coming year, I guarantee it.

What is it? It's a rule that limits the time a student athlete may practice in an organized fashion. Athletes can workout only four hours per day and 20 hours per week during the regular season.

What is its purpose? Well, according to the NCAA director of communications, Jim Marchiony, the idea is to free players from overwhelming time demands made on them by revenue sports such as football and basketball.

The theory of the committee was to eliminate the abuse and exploitation of athletes. They believed by eliminating practice time that players would spend extra time studying. They hoped to improve both graduation rates and test scores. Great idea, right?

Wrong!!!! The rule doesn't help the athlete, it hurts him. The rule flatly denies him the opportunity to improve and fine-tune his skills.

I was saddened the day I learned that Phoenix Cardinals' defensive end Dexter Manley played for Oklahoma State University for three years (77-80), despite being illiterate.

I was sick to my stomach in '81 when 48 hrs. news crew proved that some basketball athletes at N.C. State University were taking crib classes and remedial studies.

I agree that there needs to be a close scrutiny of athletic programs. It's needed to insure all athletes achieve what they entered college for, a diploma.

Having said all of this, this proposition is still bad. It only serves to punish the athlete for being good at a sport and wanting to excel. Let's look at the arguments.

It will help students study:

This is a misconception from the start. Did banning alcohol in Prohibition stop people from drinking? Did the 70's energy crisis or the recent Gulf War deter the majority of Americans from continuing to guzzle millions of dollars in oil and gas products. No!

So tell me, how do these all knowing administrators figure that by eliminating practice time, they are going to force athletes to study more?

Student athletes need this time because of poor graduation rates:

Wrong again, in fact, just the opposite is true. Athletes, as a whole, have a higher graduation rate than traditional students.

A five-year study released by the Chronicle of Higher Education covering the years '84-'89, showed student athletes excel in the classroom. Athletes in that time period graduated 56.1 percent of their recruits. The regular student body graduated only 47.9 percent.

The argument then comes up, "Well, graduation rates at other schools show athletes graduating rates below the student body."

True. Some institutions like, the University of Minnesota (25%) and University of Nevada-Las Vegas (21%) fall well below the national average when it comes to the big, time consuming sports of basketball and football. However, by the same token other schools are well above it. Duke (100%) and Richmond (100%) are excellent examples of schools who emphasize academics first.

Our own institution, UNCW, boasts a 67.3% overall athletic graduation rate. This is an 18 percent point difference over our regular student body's (49%) graduation rate.

So, the myth that athletes don't study is false. Limited hours give athletes a chance for a healthier:

Sure, the new rule stops a coach from working his players to death but, it also creates a host of new problems.

First, one has to realize that training is not limited to running, stroking, catching, and shooting. Weight training, strategic planning, and personal one on one instruction are all parts of the athlete's workout. These hours are included in the 20 hour limit.

This means an athlete has to be careful what he discusses with his coach and how he spends his time. A hour talk reviewing play calls, signals, or game films can mean less time on the field.

"We really have to cram our workouts in the pool," junior Andy Lewis said. "We have to go faster and train longer because the time is limited. Our weight room workout is now voluntary. Almost all of our 20 hours are spent in the pool."

Is this a less stressful atmosphere? I think not. Additionally the NCAA have laid the burden of catching hour breakers with the athlete's own institution. Great! Now the players have Big Brother looking over their shoulders every two second. What's next? Wire taps on locker room phones?

The question then remains, is Proposition 38 a good rule?

No it isn't. The rule's intention is admirable but, the administrators forgot to consider two important factors, the players and the sports they play.

Proposition 38 causes as many problems as it solves. The NCAA is simply trading one set for another.

It's time to go back to the drawing board.

Ex-Seahawk: Willis Pitching In Classic

BY PATRICK FOWLER
Sports Editor

As the beer commercial goes, "It doesn't get any better than this."

That's the expression former Seahawk baseball player Carl Willis must be repeating to himself these brisk autumn days and nights as his ballclub, the Minnesota Twins, battle another worst-to-first team, the Atlanta Braves, in the Fall Classic.

"In the back of my mind, I dreamed of it," Willis said in a phone interview to the Wilmington Star-News from his home in Minneapolis, "but I really never thought it was possible."

Willis, who played for the Seahawks from '79-'83, is the first UNCW athlete to compete in a championship event. The road to the top of the baseball world wasn't an easy climb.

The best way to describe the 30-year-old relief pitcher's nine-year career is nomadic. The Yanceyville, N.C. native has changed his hat eight times logging brief stints with the Detroit Tigers, Cincinnati Reds, Chicago White Sox, California Angels, and Cleveland Indians before hooking up with the Twins organization last season.

It was here that past failures went away and the journeyman began finding his niche in professional baseball.

The Twins were rebuilding their pitching department after a dismal last place finish in the American League Western Division last season. Twins management sent Willis to their triple A club in Portland, Oregon to start the season but called up the big right-hander in early April.

Willis was a solid performer for them. In 40 appearances for the Twins, Willis amassed an 8-3 record, a 2.63 earned-run average, and limited his opponents to a .232 batting average. A late post-season slump in September kept his statistics from being even more spectacular.

"I wasn't used to having stats like that," Willis said. "I started trying to do too much, and I overthrew it a little bit."

Willis again proved a worthy acquisition for the Twins in the post-season. The right-hander appeared in three games of the American League Championship Series against the Toronto Blue Jays, retiring 14 of the 16 batters he faced.

Once the playoffs started, I tried to concentrate on what I did best," Willis said. "I found it a little easier to pitch."

Both the Twins and the Braves are having Cinderella seasons. No team this century has gone from worst-to-first. Both squads were heavy long shots in spring training to win the baseball title. Minnesota was a 120-1 shot to win it all while the Braves were listed as 100-1 shot by Las Vegas oddsmakers.

"I can't predict what will happen," Willis said before the World Series. "but we will give it all that we've got and we will be well-prepared."

With the Twins up two games to none in the World Series pending Tuesday night's outcome, Willis and the rest of the organization have to be excited.

"We're a little anxious," Willis said. "Why not, it simply doesn't get any better."

Trio Nets Six Goals In 8-0 Win

BY DAVE BARNHARDT
Seahawk Sportswriter

The UNCW men's soccer team destroyed North Carolina Wesleyan College shutting them out 8-0 Sunday afternoon on Brooks field. Five different Seahawk players scored in the contest.

The win continues UNCW's (5-5-1) dominance over the Battling Bishops (4-11). The Seahawks have won all three matches against N.C. Wesleyan, and have yet to allow a goal by the Bishops. UNCW attacked early in the game scoring 3:28 minutes into the contest on a Greg Diamond goal assisted by R.T. Jones.

The Seahawks pressured N.C. Wesleyan's goal the whole half cashing in two more scores before the half. Greg Diamond nailed his second goal of the game on a penalty kick at the 26:28 mark of the game.

Paul Cairney padded UNCW's lead with a header into the left corner with 1:25 remaining. Cairney was assisted by Greg LaMendola. UNCW was in control leading 3-0 at half.

UNCW continued to punish its opponent in the second half. The Seahawks picked up right where they left off as forward Adrian Pearson scored just 52 seconds into the second period. Pearson was assisted by Scott Leftner.

Cairney, Mehmet Kocer, and John Hoffman scored goals in the second half. Cairney, Diamond, and Hoffman had two goals in the contest. The Seahawks were assisted by Alex Sibinovic, Todd Pascarella, and Miguel Bordo.

UNCW dominated the game on offense as they outshot Wesleyan 23 to 3.

"We had worked hard in practice on finishing better on the offensive end," said Seahawk coach Jackie Blackmore. "We are trying to turn it around before the conference tournament."

The CAA tournament begins next month. The Seahawks play the Citadel in the Charleston Tournament on Friday, and then play Charleston Southern on Saturday.

The Citadel has a 6-4-2 advantage in the series against UNCW.

Game times are at 2 p.m. start on Friday and 3 p.m. kickoff on Saturday.

UNCW men's basketball players work on the fundamentals during a team workout in Trask. The team is practicing five times a week now in preparation for the Seahawks '91 debut Nov. 7 in a exhibition contest against the Kentucky Sports Crusade. The Seahawks' first regular season outing is Nov. 23 against Mount Olive.

Swami Treads Through Tough Schedule

Week 9 is full of tough games. Of the twelve on the slate, seven are divisional matchups. In fact, there may only be one or two games that won't be worth checking out.

This week is an off-week for Buffalo, Indy, Miami, and the Jets; and this week also represents the second week that there are no AFC-NFC games.

Chicago at New Orleans: Neither offense has sparked in recent weeks against weaker opponents and this will be another John Madden-type game. Saints 14-6.

Cincinnati at Houston: Because I am writing this on Sunday night, I don't know how the Bengals will do on Monday, but I've got a feeling the Bengals will win this one. Take the Bengals 21-17.

Dallas at Detroit: This game is really a toss-up because it's hard to know which Lion team will show up. Even though the Lions are at home, I'm going with the Cowboys. Dallas 24-16.

Denver at New England: The Patriots burned me last week, but I don't think they can pull a second straight upset. The Broncos will maintain their half game lead in the west. 35-10.

Green Bay at Tampa Bay: I haven't a clue. Bucs in overtime 13-10.

L.A. Rams at Atlanta: Neither team can afford to lose. The Saints are ahead of them and the Niners are playing better behind them. The Rams are playing better, but the Falcons are at home. Atlanta 24-21.

Minnesota at Phoenix: If the Vikings can't beat the Patriots, who can they beat? The heat and the Cardinals will get to them to the tune (note the alliteration) of 17-9.

Pittsburgh at Cleveland: Neither team is burning up the win column, but the Browns have played better ball this year. The Steelers won't be able to overcome the onslaught of bones from the Pound. Browns 24-9.

San Diego at Seattle: With Dave Krieg back in the saddle, the Seahawks will start their play-off march. These teams will play again in two. Seattle 28-21.

San Francisco at Philadelphia: Without a quarterback, the Eagles will not touch against the Niners. The Niners will ball control this game like they did against the Lions and wear down the Eagles' defense 27-6.

Washington at N.Y. Giants: Both teams have had two weeks to get ready for this one. Jeff Hostetler will lead a fired up Giants attack and hand the Skins their first loss of the year 27-21.

L.A. Raiders at Kansas City: The Raiders have the best record in "Monday Night" games and have snuck a couple of wins in the past two weeks, but I don't see them stopping the Chiefs' running game. Chiefs 17-14.

Record last week, 7-5.

Plus Camo-of-the-Week: Battle of the 1-6 Bays.

Shafer To Leave Senate Deadlocks Over Vacant Position

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

After much debate the SGA senate is in a stalemate about how Vice President Kelli Shafer will be replaced when she vacates her office in December.

The senate considered two possible solutions: appointing president pro tempore Barry Graham to fill the vacant position or to hold a special election to fill the position.

"The constitution, as it reads now says, that the president pro tempore, Barry Graham, succeed to the office of vice president. It also says that there should be a special election to fill the post, thus contradicting itself.

At the senate meeting on Monday, a motion was brought to the floor by constitution committee chair Lisa Royal to clear up the contradiction. Royal's motion was that there be a special election to fill the vice president's position and have the constitution read so. "The constitution is flawed and it needs to be remedied before December to fill the vacancy that will be left," she said.

Graham said that he feels this solution is to follow the article of the constitution that states the president pro tempore should succeed the vice president. "I am a firm believer in order of succession. There are people that believe in succession and people that don't," he said.

"There was a lot of misinformation that was going around the meeting," Royal said.

Senator and Constitution Committee member Lee Person says he agrees with Royal. "There was a lot of miscommunication. (Graham) was elected to be pro temp, not vice president. It is not the same job, but it does overlap when the vice president is unable to be present at the meeting or has a conflict of interest."

The job of the president pro temp, as well as chairing the senate's Orientation Committee, is to preside over the senate meeting in the absence of the vice president.

Senator Sean Williams, a member of the Constitution Committee, said that the motion sent to the senate was approved unanimously by the committee.

Royal's proposal failed in the senate and was sent back to the Constitution Committee to review the qualifications of the president pro tempore. "I don't see why it didn't pass," Williams said.

Graham said that the president pro temp should have the same qualifications as the vice president. Royal, Person and Williams said that the requirements for the office will not be changed, but they will be reviewed as requested.

Williams, Person and Royal all said that they feel the main issue is that the students have a right to vote on who will fill the position. "The vice president serves the students. I want my vote to count as a student, not as a senator," Person said.

Graham said that he was against elections being held at the end of the semester. "This is a really bad

SGA To Open Bookstore

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor in Chief

UNCW students will likely have a new place to buy and sell books starting this coming December.

The Student Government Association (SGA) is in the final planning stages of opening a consignment bookstore, Joe Mitchell, SGA student services coordinator said Tuesday.

The store will begin collecting books from students in December, for sale at the beginning of next semester. Students who want to sell books will write their own sale price in each book. In January, buyers can look through stacks of each kind of book for the best price.

The store will add one dollar to the price of all of the books being sold. Mitchell said the dollar will be used by SGA to cover the expense of running the store, which he estimates will be about $3705.

Mitchell says that the new store will give students the opportunity to save money on books, or even end up making money. "The average student," he said, "will at least break even."

Students will not be able to buy books in January against money they expect to make from books they turn in in December. Mitchell said that money from book sales will be returned to

Three Year College Completion Proposed

BY ANTHONY FLINT
Boston Globe

As college costs continue to soar—with many private schools charging more than $23,000 a year—a new proposal has begun to gain currency in higher education circles: giving students the option of completing college in three years instead of four.

The idea is being championed by Oberlin College president S. Frederick Starr, who argues that a three-year baccalaureate degree would not only save families a year's tuition, but would also help colleges sharpen the focus of their curricula.

"What I am trying to do is to rethink the process of college the same way the Japanese rethought the car," Starr said in a telephone interview from his home in Ohio. "It turns out that even most Americans did not want the fins."

"The idea is worthy of consideration. And it is certain to stir debate about what the baccalaureate degree is all about," said Ernest Boyer, president of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching.

"Nobody really knows why we have four years, other than we borrowed it from Oxford and Cambridge." Cambridge now has a three-year undergraduate program, as do many other higher education institutions outside the United States.

At most American colleges, students spend the first two years primarily on general education and the liberal arts and devote the final two years to more specialized study in their majors. Boyer said a three-year degree could force institutions to integrate the two better.

Starr argues that a three-year baccalaureate—a kind of fast-track option for filling all the usual requirements, just in less time—would also force colleges to winnow out frills and lightweight courses in the curriculum. He says that institutions have a vested interest in keeping tuition-paying students on campus for four full years, but they may not need to stay that long.

Not so, said Vartan Gregorian, president of Brown University. "This makes sense economically but not intellectually," he said.

"There is more to learn now than ever before in history. If I had my choice, I would make it five years. We need more time to digest it all."

Many students today are indeed completing college in five years instead of four. Clare Cotton, president of the Association of Independent Colleges and Universities of Massachusetts, said that fewer than 50 percent of college students are earning their baccalaureates in four years.

"And what we have been worrying about is whether they complete, period," Cotton said, noting that many students drop in and out of college because of problems or because they have to work.

Another problem is that for many students, the first two years of college are remedial. The declining preparedness of high school graduates must be addressed before a three-year degree is considered, said Gregorian.

"It's not possible without reforming our school system," Gregorian said. "We have to insist on standards, what students ought to know, rather than having to accommodate them when they get to the university."

Starr acknowledges the problem, but suggests that students in need of remedial education could get it at a community college or preparatory school at greatly reduced expense. Colleges could even foot this bill for the students they want to recruit, Starr said, and still save money.

The reason Starr's proposal has attracted attention, of course, is that tuition costs have soared beyond the reach of many middle-income families. The bill for a four-year education at a reputable private liberal arts college can top $100,000.

Tuition increased at a double-digit rate during some years in the 1980s. A consumer backlash, as well as a Justice Department investigation into alleged price-fixing among top colleges, has led many institutions to hold down the increases in recent years. Rather than charging more, some colleges have turned to internal cost-cutting and streamlining.

But the tuition increases continue to outpace inflation by several percentage points, and prices are not expected to level off much in the 1990s. At the same time, state and federal financial aid have not kept pace, leaving many students to borrow heavily to finance their education.

Higher education leaders point out that operating a college is inherently an expensive enterprise, particularly because it is labor-intensive. Faculty salaries have soared as universities compete with each other and with industry for the best and the brightest teachers. Laboratory equipment, the maintenance of existing facilities and the demand for

Bush Compromises On Unemployment Bill

BY DAVID NESS
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

WASHINGTON — Tuning in to voter concern over the sluggish economy, President Bush has told his congressional allies to strike a deal with Democrats on a long-debated bill to pay extra benefits to jobless workers.

Although specific details of a compromise plan remain to be resolved, the willingness of both parties to begin serious talks reflected their mounting concern over the political repercussions of continued failure to act.

Bush, in particular, has seen his job performance ratings sink as the economy limps along and poll respondents express decreasing confidence in his ability to revive it.

In a Newsweek poll last week, Bush's overall approval score dropped sharply to 55 percent from 66 percent the week before. In a Gallup poll, only 49 percent of respondents said they would vote for Bush next year — the lowest level registered by the pollster since the question was posed last February.

More than 2 million workers have exhausted their basic 26 weeks of jobless benefits, and the number is expected to reach 3.5 million by next spring.

Bush had objected to previous Democratic-sponsored bills that would have extended unemployment benefits for up to 20 weeks, on grounds that they would add to the budget deficit. Rostenkowski, D-Ill., subsequently proposed a less costly 13-week extension.

On Monday, Bush met with Republican congressional leaders and later called House Minority Leader Robert Michel, R-Ill. His message: Open talks with Ways and Means Chairman Dan Rostenkowski, D-Ill., to seek an accord on extending payments to workers who have exhausted their basic jobless benefits.

Rostenkowski immediately withdrew his own proposal from consideration and set out Tuesday to explore terms for a compromise with Michel, Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., and Senate Finance Committee Chairman Lloyd Bentsen, D-Texas.

"I think we're going to have to work out our differences," Bentsen told reporters Tuesday afternoon. "It's important to get this money out to those unemployed workers, and we must get this legislation passed."

If the president's initiative bears fruit, it will be the second time in a week that Bush has softened his opposition to stalled legislation on a politically important issue.

Last week, Bush relented on a new civil rights bill he had long opposed, ridding himself of what could have been a troubling issue in his run for re-election.

Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell, D-Maine, did not hesitate to remind reporters of the political implications of Bush's latest move.

"The president has just reversed himself on civil rights, and if he's now prepared to reverse himself on unemployment, we'd be very happy (about) that," Mitchell said.

"The gist of our conversation on unemployment was to get our heads together (with Democrats) and craft a compromise acceptable to him," said Michel.

Michel said he pointed out to Bush that the economy was not rebounding at a robust pace and that "we've got a different mix today among jobless workers—not only factory workers but a lot of middle-class, middle-income people who've got big house payments, big car payments, college tuitions, who are facing real traumatic changes."

In short, Michel indicated, the profile of today's unemployed worker has been reshaped to include the very people that usually vote Republican in presidential elections.

Michel said he and Bush agreed that "some bridge is necessary to help these people get across this gap" in economic growth.

"The president always has got his eyes open and his ears open," Michel said, "and, by all accounts, the recovery hasn't been what we all hoped for. It's sluggishly sluggish, plodding along at a slow clip."

Procedure Changes

BY JENNIFER WILSON
Staff Writer

Students will use a new procedure to register for Spring semester courses during the next two weeks.

In the past, students got in line as early as 8:00 a.m. and had to wait until 1:00 p.m. when the registration process began to try to get desired courses. "The new process of pre-registration is designed to reduce stress for anyone involved with registration," says Dr. Sue Lamb, assistant dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

The process begins with a student obtaining a permit to register from the faculty advisor.

The next step is to go to the appropriate data entry station the morning of the first day of eligibility for pre-registration to sign up for a time to pre-register. Sign up begins at 8:00 a.m. at the data entry stations. By signing up in the morning, students will no longer have to wait in line all day, missing classes and cluttering hallways, Lamb said.

Students should return to their assigned stations at 1:00 p.m. the same day and wait until their name is called. If a student is not present when his name is called, he will lose his turn and have to sign up again. Students who do not sign up in the morning will have to do so when they arrive at the entry station.

One advantage Lamb points out about the new procedure is that students will no longer have to wait while people at the computer try to find alternate courses. If a desired course is closed and the student has no alternate courses prepared, he will have to stay aside and rework his schedule. Once first alternate courses are chosen, he will be fit in between other pre-registering students.

If a student pre-registers before the date printed on the permit to register, the pre-registration will be cancelled and the student must go through the process on his or her designated day.

The procedure is being used on a trial basis at all data entry stations on campus, but has been used successfully in the Cameron School of Business for some time.

Bush Blamed

Governors Look Into Health Care

BY AMY STROMBERG
Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel

WASHINGTON — Democratic governors and members of Congress on Tuesday called for comprehensive health care reform, saying the present health care system is financially destroying states and the American people.

Florida Gov. Lawton Chiles joined Democratic big guns from around the country in launching a political offensive on the issue. They seized the occasion of President Bush's absence from the country for the Middle East peace talks to accuse his administration of neglecting Americans.

"We're saying, Mr. President, will you come to the table? Will you sit down with us?" Chiles said.

Chiles and other governors were joined at an afternoon news conference by Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell, D-Maine, and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass.

"Everywhere I go I hear tragic stories of families who have lost their health care insurance and have been ruined by the huge costs of providing for their loved ones," Mitchell said.

"Contrary to the belief of some, this is not just a problem of the poor ... more than 37 million people in this country without health care coverage are fully employed."

Mitchell's remarks followed a panel discussion by Democratic governors who are calling on the administration to work with governors and states to reform health care.

Said Mitchell: "We're asking for health care reform before, not after, the presidential election."

The Democrats' attack on what they said was an unwillingness to find solutions could not have been more strategically timed.

Although they said the meeting had been scheduled long before the Middle East peace talks, the circumstances worked in the Democrats' favor.

With Bush in Madrid, Spain, Democrats could highlight his attraction to the foreign arena and point to what critics have called the president's lack of a domestic agenda.

Democrats said their goals were to improve access to health care, control costs and cut bureaucracy.

Democratic governors who attended the health care forum said they had asked for a meeting today with high-ranking administration officials to share ideas on reform.

But those officials, including the president's chief of staff, the director of the Office of Management and Budget and the secretary of Health and Human Services were unavailable, the Democrats said.

Chiles said he would not attend a substitute meeting of staff aides. No policymakers will be there, he said.

Chiles said Florida cannot continue to pay for the spiraling cost of health care. He wants states to be able to fashion their own systems and be unfettered by federal rules on how states must spend federal dollars.

Chiles said he saw little reason to be optimistic.

"We're here (in Washington) because we have to be here. We're in trouble," he said. "Is there any reason for hope? I don't think so."

Other Democratic governors attending the conference said their states were in no better shape on health care.

One exception was Hawaii's Gov. John Waihee. Because of a plan started in 1974, 98 percent of state residents are covered by health insurance. Hawaii requires all employers to provide medical insurance.

Student Convicted, Put LSD In Drink

Knight-Ridder Newspapers

DETROIT — When he heard an Oakland County jury had deliberated only four hours before reaching a verdict Tuesday, the father of Troy, Mich., teen-ager Linda Conflitti, knew his daughter's fate was sealed.

Asked before the verdict was read to meet with a reporter after the announcement, Jerry Conflitti answered: "Forget it. Would you be available if it was guilty on your daughter?"

Linda Conflitti, 18, was found guilty Tuesday of lacing the coffee of Troy Athens High School teacher Robert Heffernan with LSD last Dec. 7.

The trial was the second for Conflitti; the first ended without a decision after a jury deliberated five days.

When the verdict was announced, Linda Conflitti kept her composure but Jerry Conflitti buried his head in his hands. After the jury left, they hugged as Linda Conflitti wiped tears and her father sobbed.

She faces up to five years in prison after Dec. 6 sentencing — 364 days after the poisoning. She is free pending the posting of a $50,000 bond.

Heffernan, who testified that he suffered hallucinations from the drug, is on medical leave from the Athens High School and could not be reached for comment. Conflitti was suspended after charges were filed against her, but is attending Oakland Community College.

Conflitti claimed she only pretended to slip a pill in Heffernan's coffee in the classroom. Neither she nor her father would comment after the verdict.

Ten of the 12 jurors were ready to convict Conflitti on Monday afternoon.

"The evidence was overwhelming," said one juror, an Oakland County man in his 30s who asked not to be identified.

After more discussion Tuesday morning, they took a second poll. The vote was unanimous.

Inconsistencies in Conflitti's testimony strengthened jurors' convictions that she had drugged her teacher, the juror said.

But juror Tom Hudson of Rochester Hills said the decision to convict Conflitti was not easy. "There's some sympathy for a young lady on trial," Hudson said. "This could alter a lot of things in her life."

At Athens High School, the news of Conflitti's conviction was not widespread by midday, but the tone of those who knew seemed to be one of relief.

Principal Robert Cross said reaction was subdued because many students who knew Conflitti and others involved in the case have graduated.

Cross said no general announcement was made. But Andy Goodwin, 15, an Athens sophomore, said one of his teachers announced the decision in class.

Glenn Rexer, president of the Troy Education Association, said he hoped the verdict would teach others that pranks can have serious consequences.

MEDICAL CHART

Pink Floyd guitarist David Gilmour and bandmates Steve O'Rourke and Nick Mason were banged up Monday when their race car overshot an embankment during the 1,740-mile Pan-American Rally. O'Rourke broke a leg and was flown to a Houston hospital for surgery, accompanied by Gilmour, who suffered cuts on his face. Mason, with only slight injuries, got into the driver's seat of their Jaguar and stayed in the race, a band spokesman said Tuesday. No word on who was driving at the time of the accident. The rockers have competed twice before in the grueling road race, which runs from southern Mexico to the Rio Grande.

PLEA BARGAIN OFFERED TO PEE-WEE

Prosecutors in Sarasota, Fla., made actor Paul Reubens, better known as Pee-wee Herman, an offer Tuesday that one of his lawyers says may be too good to refuse.

If the "Pee-wee's Playhouse" star agrees to plead no contest to indecent-exposure charges, the state won't seek an adjudication of guilt, leaving him free of a conviction in his July arrest at an adult theater. Reubens, 39, would be fined $50 plus court costs and sentenced to 50 hours of community service.

"I anticipate Mr. Reubens will accept it," defense lawyer Ronald Dresnick said outside court. "It's an offer that's very difficult to refuse."

Reubens' lead attorney, Richard Gerstein, said he hadn't yet discussed the offer with his client. "I think it's a fair and reasonable offer, but the final decision will be his."

PRICE SHINES A LIGHT ON HIS DEEP DARK SECRET

Scaremeister Vincent Price knows all about the terror of things that go bump in the night. "The dark is probably the thing that is most frightening to me," the 80-year-old horror star tells People magazine just in time for Halloween. "I still don't like pitch darkness. I have all sorts of fancy night-lights and things that are on all over the house, always." Let there be light.

A PEAK EXPERIENCE: SIR EDMUND'S IN THE MONEY

New Zealand is putting Sir Edmund Hillary on its new five-dollar bill, an honor that would please the Mount Everest conqueror more if he were, um, dead. "I pointed out that I was not quite in that condition yet. The only trouble I feel about it is that I will have to be respectable for the rest of my life," said Hillary, 72, who scaled the 29,000-foot Himalayan peak in 1953. New Zealand Reserve Bank Governor Don Brash calls Hillary the closest thing the nation has to "a living folk hero."

SGA Gets To Work For Students

The Student Government Association is going to provide a service to UNCW students that could really make life easier.

One of the most complained-about issues on this campus has always been the price of books at the UNCW Bookstore. Students have complained that the Bookstore charges exorbitant prices for new books, buys them back from students at extremely low prices, and then sells the used books for slightly less exorbitant prices. If the SGA plan comes through, students will have another place to buy and sell books.

The SGA consignment bookstore will probably be in service this December. The new service is planned to give students the full value of books bought and sold, adding only enough to prices to cover the cost of overhead in the store.

By implementing this plan, SGA has shown that it can be in touch with student needs and act on them.

This is not to say that the new consignment bookstore is a sure success. Given the plan for operation of the store, it could fail. It is questionable that students will be willing to turn in books to the store with no guarantee that they will be paid for them, as they are at the University Bookstore. Also, giving each student the right to name his price for a book is asking that overly-optimistic sellers will actually drive up the price of used books.

But the risks notwithstanding, credit must be given to Joe Mitchell, student services coordinator and Bookstore Committee Chair Christy Gunnell for good intentions and hard work.

WLOZ Does Our Music Scene Good

In the past few weeks, some new musical groups have been heard in Wilmington. WLOZ, in cooperation with Jacob's Run downtown on Market St., has been sponsoring "WLOZ Night" featuring alternative bands which bring a welcomed new perspective to the growingly mundane Wilmington music scene.

Last Friday night, WLOZ brought the Godbullies, who provided the crowd at Jake's one of the most exciting, funny, and sometimes scary shows in recent memory.

And don't be fooled. Even if you don't get into the music being played, you will benefit from it. The large and responsive crowds at these shows are getting Wilmington's name out to bands from far away. This will surely help to make our area a more frequent stop for all kinds of musicians.

WLOZ's Danny Ling, the staff of Jacob's Run, and all the others involved with these concerts should be congratulated.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dear Editor,
I am writing in regard to the unjust criticism Phil Smith's column on the Thomas confirmation. Every other week I look forward to his amusing articles. They add a cynical and funny look at everyday life. I feel that Mr. Russell misinterpreted the meaning of the column. My advice to him would be to lighten up.

Live a Mature, Centered Life

BY BOB HAYWOOD
Campus Minister

Ever been to a monastery? I don't imagine that many of you have. I spend three or four days in a monastery twice a year and I've become very impressed by the lifestyle of the brothers who live a cloistered life. They never seem to rush. Their pace, whether walking from chapel to dinner, or riding their bikes to the farm, is always slow and unhurried.

Even brother Steven, the guest master, is always this way.

My life is very different. When I feel like I'm going six different directions at the same time, I remember the brothers and become hard on myself because of all my rushing. I don't know about you, but there are days when my mind is like a TV set with a tuner gone mad. It flips from channel to channel, image to image, issue to person with incredible rapidness, flip, flip, flip, flip, flip.

Sometimes my brain simply can't stay with one issue more than a few minutes and another whole dimension of work reminds me that I have to be somewhere in ten minutes or that I am suppose to call someone to accomplish some task. And when it gets completely out of control, the whole process seems to speed up and then I short circuit, which is signified by the onset of a headache or an incredible sense of being worn out and tired.

Another image that works for me is that I feel like a juggler who has to keep ten balls in the air at the same time. In the morning, I feel myself asking the question, "Who's in charge of this TV set in my brain that causes me to flip so fast from channel to channel to channel? Who's responsible for my trying to juggle ten balls rather than three or five? Where is the focus of my control?"

The monks try to place the location of their control with God. They have also created an external environment that simplifies life to the point where there is an ongoing limitation to the number of balls that they are expected to juggle. But in our world, multiplicity of demands on our time and energy are a cultural fact of life.

The issue becomes "Who is in control?" And the problem related to this issue lies, at least in my perception, in the amount of power we give to forces outside ourselves to determine how many balls we should juggle or how many different channels we are trying to pay attention to in our minds. We all want to be accepted, approved and supported by a range of different people or groups in our lives. And much of our behavior and involvement in activities is determined by our need to please others or avoid being rejected by them. Phrases like, "The profession demands . . .", "My friends say I should . . .", and "I don't want to disappoint . . ." all speak of sources that control our decisions and our behavior that lies outside ourselves.

Maturity is a process wherein we internalize our source of control. At the heart of who I am, that place where God and I mystically connect, there is a reality called Self, which is quite different from our ego that self exists as THE source of control. This will lead to the greatest sense of satisfaction and fulfillment that is possible for us.

It is through silence and meditation that I have learned to sink down to that Stillpoint in my being that slows down my tuner and allows me to focus in on one or two channels as the appropriate focus for my given day or days. It is there that my reality becomes clearer and clearer and I discover some of the compulsions and illusions to which I have yielded control of my life. It is there that freedom begins to emerge, the freedom to choose which three balls to juggle this day or discover the courage to tell someone that there is a ball that I don't intend to juggle. No juggling means, "No thank you, I simply cannot take on that responsibility right now."

Therefore I invite you to find a quiet corner in your life and spend some time reflecting on who's in charge of the TV tuner in your mind. Living a centered life is not just possible for monks. It is also possible for you and me, but only if we learn to find our way along the inner path to our deepest Self.

Harvard Doesn't Have Everything

BY JON MARGOLIS
Chicago Tribune

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — To visit Harvard is to remember how impressive are the students and faculty at . . . oh, Iowa State comes to mind.

It comes to mind because of the professor at an Ivy League university (not Harvard) who taught there for a semester and concluded that were it not for his domestic obligations back East he'd relocate to Ames.

"The kids out there never read Baudelaire," he said. "They probably never even heard of him. But they're excited about learning. They think everything is worthwhile."

It would be an exaggeration to say that at Harvard no one thinks anything is worthwhile. But there is an air of world-weary ennui about the place.

This could reflect the influence of deconstructionism, which is also probably unknown at Iowa State, in which case Iowa State should consider itself blessed. To be fair, deconstructionism, a French disease, was introduced to America at Yale. But it has spread, as French diseases will, and it's here too.

The description of English 294, "Post-Modernism and its Discontents," notes that its "post-modernist epistemology that demands skepticism about the founding narrative of Western culture" will include the works of Jacques Derrida and Michel Foucault, deconstructionism's high priests.

If you didn't even know that Western culture had a founding narrative, you may not know what deconstructionism is. Neither does anyone else, but it seems to be the belief that because anything ever written was influenced by its author's prejudices and surroundings, nothing ever written can mean anything at all. Nor can anything ever written about anything every written.

If this is true, everyone might just as well shut up, which, come to think of it, the deconstructionists might perform a valuable service by doing. Immediately.

It is uncertain whether English professor Sacvan Bercovitch is a deconstructionist. But he might be, having noted in his new book about "The Scarlet Letter" that it continues to be read because it is the "liberal example par excellence of art as ideological mimesis." Now don't you feel silly having loved it all these years as only a fascinating story of moral complexity and individual triumph?

Harvard is also renowned for its law school, which was in the news not long ago when students protested the absence of black females on its faculty. One student, herself black and female, said that the situation deprived her of a role model. No one asked why an adult needs a role model of any race or gender.

Perhaps this is because the folks at the law school have been too busy arguing over Critical Legal Studies, something that could be argued about only at Harvard. This is a theory based on the extraordinary insight that the rich and powerful fare better in legal proceedings than do the rest of us.

Most of the rest of us figured this out by the age of 15 or so, and therefore were not inspired to create a movement over it. But just as the intellectual elite ignores obvious questions (why does a growing need for a role model?), it is shocked by the obvious lesson (the rich and powerful are richer and more powerful).

To be aware of the obvious, though, one must be aware of the objective world, which is difficult for those quite as full of the subjective self as are many Harvardites. The law school alone provides Laurence Tribe, Alan Dershowitz and Arthur Miller, three of the leading names in American show business, each of whom is too enthralled with himself to pay much attention to mere mortals.

Well, one must be careful. The line between tweaking the intelligentsia and disdaining intellect can be murky, and the latter is as stupid as the former is noble. So it should quickly be noted that there are superb people at this most impressive institution. All the pomposity in creation just slightly outweighs Robert Coles, who, knowing there is a God, knows that there is an objective world and that clear thinking can help it. Whoever else may be in the English department, so is Helen Vendler, who writes clearly about poetry. She teaches it in Keats, which no doubt is filled with ripeness to the core, as someone once said.

The problem is not Harvard as such but Harvard as our leading symbol of certified academia, where historians write not about what happened but about some other historian's interpretation of what happened and literary critics examine not the work itself but earlier criticisms of it. Not to mention where people think there's a founding narrative of Western culture.

Proof that at least some students are aware of this was the T-shirt worn a few years ago by residents of one dormitory proclaiming it a place where "intelligence is just another big word." There's nothing wrong with a Harvard education that couldn't be cured by a semester at Iowa State.

Enjoy A Relaxing Day Sailing On The Ocean

It began as a fun nautical outing. 10 of us in a motorboat off the coast of Miami. The weather was sunny and we saw no signs of danger, other than the risk of sliding overboard because every exposed surface on the boat was covered with a layer of snack-related grease. We had enough cholesterol on board to put the entire U.S. Olympic team into cardiac arrest. This is because all 10 of us were guys.

I hate to engage in gender stereotyping, but when women plan the menu for a recreational outing, they usually come up with a nutritionally balanced menu featuring all the major food groups, including the Sliced Carrots Group, the Pieces of Fruit Cut Into Cubes Group, the Utensils Group and the Plate Group. Whereas guys tend to focus on the Carbonated Malt Beverages Group and the Fatal Snacks Group. On this particular trip, our food supply consisted of about 14 bags of potato chips and one fast-food fried-chicken Giant Economy Tub o' Fat. Nobody brought, for example, napkins, the theory being that you could just wipe your hands on your stomach. Then you could burp.

This is what guys on all-guy boats are doing while women are thinking about their relationships. The reason the grease smeared everywhere was that 10 of the guys on the boat were 10-year-olds, who, because of the way their still-developing digestive systems work, cannot chew without punching. This results in a lot of dropped and thrown food. On this boat, you regularly encountered semi-grawled pieces of chicken skittering across the deck toward you like small but hostile alien creatures from the Kentucky Fried Planet. Periodically a man would yell "CUT THAT OUT!" at the boys, then burp to indicate the depth of his concern. Discipline is vital on a boat.

We motored through random-looking ocean until we found exactly what we were looking for: a patch of random-looking ocean. There we dropped anchor and dove for Florida lobster, which protect themselves by using their tails to scoot backward really fast. They've been fooling predators with this move for millions of years, but the guys on our boat, being advanced life forms, including a dentist, figured it out in under three hours.

I myself did not participate, because I believe that lobsters are the result of a terrible genetic accident involving nuclear radiation and cockroaches. I mostly sat around, watching guys lunge out of the water, leave lobsters into the boat, burp, and plunge back in. Meanwhile the lobsters were scrambling around in the chicken grease, frantically trying to shoot backward through the forest of legs belonging to 10-year-old boys squirting each other with gobs of the No. 197,000,000,000 Sun Block that their moms had sent along. It was a total Guy Day, very relaxing, until the arrival of the barracuda.

This occurred just after we'd all gotten out of the water. One of the men, Larry, was fishing, and he hooked a barracuda right where we had been swimming. This was unsettling. The books all say that barracuda rarely eat people, but very few barracuda can read, and they have far more teeth than would be necessary for a strictly seafood diet. Their mouths look like the entire $39.95 set of Ginsu knives, including the handy Arm Slicer.

We gathered around to watch Larry fight the barracuda. His plan was to catch it, weigh it, and release it with a warning. After 10 minutes he almost had it to the boat, and we were all pretty excited for him, when all of a sudden . . .

BA-DUMP . . . BA-DUMP . . . Those of you who you read music recognize this as the sound track from the motion picture "Jaws." Sure enough, cruising right behind Larry's barracuda, thinking sushi, was a shark. And not just ANY shark. It was a hammerhead shark, perennial winner of the coveted Oscar for Ugliest Fish. It has a weird, T-shaped head with a big eyeball on each tip, so that it can see around both sides of a telephone pole. This ability is of course useless for a fish, but nobody would dare try to explain this to a hammerhead.

The hammerhead, its fin breaking the surface, zig-zagged closer to Larry's barracuda, then surged forward.

"Oh —!" went Larry, reeling furiously.

CHOMP went the hammerhead, and suddenly Larry's barracuda was in a new weight division.

CHOMP went the hammerhead again, and now Larry was competing in an entirely new category, Fish Consisting Of Only A Head.

The boys were staring at the remainder of the barracuda, deeply impressed.

"This is your leg," said the dentist. "This is your leg in 'Jaws.' Any questions?"

The boys, for the first time all day, were quiet.

How About A Little Trick or Treating?

"Well sports fans, the World Series championship game is now in the 25th inning and the score is a whopping 0 to 0."

That was the last thing I heard before I felt a tremendous thud on the back of my head, lost consciousness, and fell to the ground. You see, I took dad's Leer jet out to the Metrodome last week to see the final game of the World Series.

Naturally I sat with the Braves fans because the Minnesota fans wielded snott-laden hankies, which I considered more repulsive than foam rubber tomahawks. Repulsive, yes, but dangerous they are not. That's because I was standing in front of some mentally deteriorated "Brave" who got a little too happy with his AUTHENTIC TEN POUND tomahawk. The rest is too disgusting to tell. Besides, I am a man of today, and today is of course, Halloween.

Ah yes, I remember the fun times I had as a kid on Halloween. We rolled yards, egged houses, and left burning bags of fresh doggie-doo on doorsteps. My personal favorite was collecting all of the "FOR SALE" signs from miles around and placing them in the front yard of an unwanted neighbor. I long for the innocence of childhood.

BOOKSTORE SCHOLARSHIP OFFERED

Two scholarships that are worth the cost of instate tuition are being offered for the Spring semester. Applications may be picked up at the Student Government Office, University Union Room 200. Of the two scholarships, one will be given according to need, the other will be given according to extra curricular activities. These applications need to be turned in by November 18.

Movie tickets to Carmike Cinemas, regularly $3.00 are now going on sale for $2.00 at the Information Center. You must purchase and use your tickets before December 31, Sunday through Thursdays.

Deadline extended...

The deadline for the Logo contest for the Student Government Association has been extended to Friday, November 1. The logo must incorporate the theme "Students Serving Students" and must be turned in by 12:00 noon. Submit your logo, and you may win a $50.00 gift certificate to the Bookstore.

Then of course, there was always trick or treating. This is when you go from door to door ringing doorbells and grabbing bowls of candy from unsuspecting old ladies. Whenever I got home I had to sneak my candy into the house or else mom and dad would want to "inspect" it. They claimed to be looking for razor blades, sand, or arsenic, but I know they just wanted to pick out the good stuff for themselves.

Another good way to get candy was to hide in the bushes outside of your house and jump the smaller kids as they walked by. This was accomplished by exclaiming "BOO!!!" at around 500 decibels. "Boo" is an amazing word. It is only three little letters, but will cause the darndest amount of horror in small children on a dark Halloween night.

Costumes were always a fun part of Halloween. Yes, back in the days before Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles we had to come up with somewhat original costumes. One year I dressed as a mop, but I would not advise this because everywhere I went people picked me up and rubbed my head around on the floor. I dressed as a large booger one year, but this was not a good idea either because all of my friends "picked" on me. But no matter what I dressed up as, I always made sure to pick out a good Halloween outfit. It is because of this that I present for your reading enjoyment, my FIVE BEST HALLOWEEN COSTUMES FOR 1991.

1.) The Pee-Wee Herman costume is available from Aphrodite's House of Hard Core. The outfit comes complete with "attachments and accessories."

2.) The Saddam Hussein costume is sure to be a hit this year. It comes complete with a white head-wrap designed especially to be taken off and made into a flag. This costume is available from Baghdad Imports.

3.) For you couples, the Clarence Thomas and Anita Hill costume may be just the thing for you. It comes complete with a dirty joke book and a "Long Dong Silver" movie. This controversial costume has been in the making for over eight years and only recently won approval from the U.S. Senate Halloween Costume Committee. (Among costumes not winning approval was the Dan Quayle outfit. Senators called the costume a "dirty campaign trick" because when you pulled the string, it just kept on saying "Bush-Quayle in '92".

extra-curricular kinda thing to do.

5. To do the "write" thing.

4. Because "Inquiring minds want to know!"

3. Because you get your name in the paper.

2. Because it's fun and it's still legal!

1. Because if the editors don't get more writers, we'll get very angry. You wouldn't want us to get angry. You wouldn't like us when we're angry. (We turn all green and disgusting, no, wait that's the Hulk. Never mind!)

So what are you waiting for? Apply at THE SEAHAWK, University Union room 200. E. There are vacancies in: News, Sports and Arts and Entertainment.

Phillip Loughlin Dreams Sometime Have Meaning

I had a dream the other night. I woke up to come to class and I was in my truck. Sitting up painfully, (I always sit up painfully in the morning, it had nothing to do with sleeping in the cab of a truck) I looked out the window to see that my world had changed. All the houses in my neighborhood were gone. Along with the houses had gone the trees, the grass, and even the shrubbery. All I could see for miles was a flattened earth, covered in blacktop and cars. Some cars were packed tightly together in blocks, separated by shiny ribbons of road. Others were slipping along the roads, heading to work, school, and various other daily diversions.

I realized that each car, truck, and van had a family living in it. In the space next to me, my wife and baby still snoozed in our Honda Civic. My neighbor had just rolled down her window to fetch the morning newspaper. In the Chevy van down the street, smoke curled from a metal chimney, and I caught the pleasant scent of sausage frying.

In the back of my pickup I saw that our dining room table was already arranged, and the automatic coffee pot was just finishing its brew cycle. I grabbed my cup off the dash and hobbled around to get my fix of liquid energy.

Glancing at my watch, I realized that I was running late. I fixed a cup for my wife and tapped on her windshield. She opened sleepy eyes and rolled down her window. I handed her the cup, gave her a kiss, and jumped in the truck to leave.

As I drove across town, I marveled at the changes I saw. Where buildings had once stood, parking decks rose three and four stories. Computer cables and telephone lines draped from car windows. Secretaries and office runners scurried between cars. In the bigger lots, the errand runners used mopeds. Public schools were replaced by dozens of buses. Each bus had a blackboard in the back, and the seat-belts folded down to make tiny desks.

I approached the campus, and stared in awe at the sight that met me. All the beautifully cloned class and administrative buildings were gone. Brooks Field shone in the morning sun, apparently newly paved and lightly coated with dew. Students sat on the hoods of their cars during their classes, listening in awe as professors held forth from a podium mounted on the tailgate of a canopied pickup truck. Speakers like those used at drive-in theaters were provided for inclement weather, when students were forced to remain in their cars.

A bird flitted overhead, and I looked up to watch its flight. It dawned on me then that this was the first bird I had seen. An area of fog and darkness swallowed the bird, and the mysterious area likewise attracted me. I drove toward the spot and as I neared it, the fog parted to reveal the Bluetenthal Wildflower Reserve, still intact. The trees swarmed with birds, and I realized that there was no place else in Wilmington for them to roost except power lines.

Suddenly a shriek like an air raid siren cut through the dream. Like a vengeful claw from the real world, the sound snatched me into wakefulness and I swatted at the alarm clock.

I sure am glad we aren't really so enamored of our cars that we would pave the whole world for them.

FOR YOUR INFORMATION

The following motion by the Psychology Department was REFERRED to the Academic Standards Committee for study. It was pointed out that some means needs to be instituted of handling students who are legitimately absent but incommunicado.

That students who are absent from the first class meeting of a regular semester or summer session and who have not notified the instructor or the office of the Dean of Students of the reason for their absence within 24 hours of the first class meeting may, at the discretion of the department in which the course is taught, be dropped from the course to enable other students to be enrolled. (92-1-4)

SGA Consignment Bookstore

The student government is implementing a new plan to aid in cutting the costs of purchasing books and at the same time, ensuring that the student will receive an adequate amount of money in exchange for their used books. Joe Mitchell, Student Services Coordinator, initiated the plan which is now being developed by a special senate committee headed by Christy Gunnell. The program will work as follows: You bring your book during the specified time and indicate the price you feel is fair. This would be more than what the bookstore is planning to offer you. SGA will add $1.00 to that price to cover storage and pay the workers. Students will come to buy books during the next specified time and find that they can purchase books cheaper than what the bookstore is offering. To make this clearer, suppose the bookstore offers you $19.50 for your book, and then sell it for $30.50. If you go through the Student Government Consignment Bookstore, and ask $25.00, you have made $4.50 more, and the student that buys it saves $4.50. That is a total savings of $9.00 that the students have been able to enjoy.

There will be an informational meeting on Tuesday, November 12 from 6:30 - 8:00. Students interested in earning $4.50 an hour working the Consignment Bookstore should be in attendance. If you cannot attend the meeting please contact Christy Gunnell 432 - 5381.

Take The Chuck Norris Quiz & Win A New Car (See Adjacent Headline)

BY GLENN LOVELL
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

In "The Hitman," his new bad-guy-and-badder-cops opus, Chuck Norris has an out-of-body experience. Problem is: It isn't far enough out, and he returns as a more-determined undercover cop who infiltrates Seattle's Mafia. That is, when he isn't setting a troubled youth named Timmy on the straight-and-narrow.

Norris' handwork, of course, is prepared for a select few. How do you know if that includes you? Simple. Take the following Chuck Norris quiz. Four or more wrong: Stake out the neighborhood art house this weekend. Two wrong entitles you to a front-row seat at "The Hitman." A perfect score buys you a screen test and a chance to play Timmy's older brother in "Hitman II: A Near Miss."

(1) Norris' getup of choice in "Hitman" is: A. Porpiek hat and rumpled raincoat. B. Harlem pants and fringed vest. C. Black ankle-length duster and sunglasses.

(2) The illegal stuff that causes much bloodshed is: A. Colombian-grown Folgers. B. Pure-cut organo. C. Cocaine.

(3) Chuck's bedroom wall is decorated with: A. Needlepoint of Whistler's mother. B. Sanskrit hangings from Tibet. C. Long-horned steer's head.

(4) Norris' non-de-undercover is: A. Paul Reubens. B. Bret Rabbit. C. Grogan.

(5) Sal, one of Marco Laganni's partners, speaks his mind at a mob meeting. For his candor, Sal is: A. Made guest-of-honor at Marco's daughter's baptism. B. Treated to linguistic and clams. C. Plugged where he stands.

(6) Marco, a poetic type, tells his boys, "It's your job to carve him a brand-new... right between the eyes." Marco wants a: A. Bellybutton. B. "Mother" tattoo. C. Anatomical part that can't be repeated in a family newspaper.

(7) When Iranian thugs tell a rival Italian gang member, "You are free to go in good health. Drive safely," they mean: A. "Buckle up and watch those school speed zones." B. "Our cultures and gangs should be more closely allied." C. "Duck, you sucker — you're about to be blown to Timbuktu!"

(8) Norris counsels Timmy that "running from your fear is more painful than facing it." This advice is followed by: A. Quiet time and a lecture on civil disobedience. B. Popcorn and "Billy Jack Goes to Washington." C. A lesson in the manly art of hitting your opponent square in the solar plexus.

(9) Norris' relaxing, apes-ganplay hobby is: A. Steven Seagal videos. B. Watching "Death Wish I-IV: The Complete Epic." C. Building plastic models of jet fighters.

(10) David Carradine and Clarence Williams III are among those former TV heroes who have been reincarnated as exploitation manias. The psycho cop in "Hitman" is played by: A. Ty Hardin. B. Lorenzo Lamas. C. Michael "Then Came Bronson" Parks.

(11) Norris' renegade cop also is a closet naturalist who, while watching dolphins at an aquarium, observes: A. "Flipper" was his favorite TV show as a kid. B. He once totaled a perfectly good speedboat on Flipper's cousin. C. "You know, there was a time when they walked on land."

(12) The final shoot-out takes place at: A. Gettysburg. B. A Treklike convention. C. A foggy shipyard.

(13) "Hitman" was directed by Aaron Norris, who is: A. Aaron Burr's great-great-grandson. B. A talented young cult director who coincidentally shares the star's surname. C. Chuck's very grateful older brother.

If you figured out that all the correct answers are C, you may be too smart to see this movie.

Let's Munch Down On Blob-Boogers

BY CASEY NEEL
Entertainment Writer

Have you ever devoured a "blob-booger"? How about a "slime-doggie"?

If you've eaten oysters, you have. There are a lot of things we probably don't know about our North Carolina marine life. Well, now is the time to learn, with Peter Meyer's Nature Guide to the Carolina Coast.

Meyer, a practicing physician and environmentalist, holds a degree in zoology, and has written an easy-to-read guide that answers almost any coastal environmental question. Using descriptive, non-scientific language, along with drawings and full-color photographs, Meyer's guide makes it possible to recognize our marine life.

Meyer's Nature Guide fully describes birds, crabs, shells, fish, and other species that are abundant along the Carolina coasts — and the drawings and photos make these creatures easily recognizable.

Have you ever seen a "bird with a big red nose wearing a tuxedo"? That's the Oystercatcher. It is found on our sandy beaches and mudflats. You will know it by its big red bill. With the help of Meyer's illustrated guide, you can have fun thumbing through this simply organized guide as you spot them on the beach! This light, vinyl-covered paperback is perfect to take along anywhere.

Did you know that Grouper start their lives as females, and later change to males? Also, oysters change sex repeatedly during their life span. Meyer tells all about crustaceans, fish and shells with enlightening details about their ecosystems and habitats. The easy wording and slight humor make it hard to put down.

Many of us love seafood, but wouldn't know which creatures were edible. Meyer's guide tells you. There is a lot of delicious and edible sea life that we aren't utilizing in our diets. For instance, Pigfish, in spite of its name, is actually very tasty and easily filled. It is one of the many fish that are thrown back. In fact, many are simply left on piers to die.

Meyer also gives tips on keeping a fishing trip safe and fun. If you reel in a Toadfish, an ugly slime and spiny-covered fish, be careful taking it off the hook, they bite!

Meyer's guide lets us in on many secrets. Would you know what type of Jellyfish is virtually harmless, and what it looks like? Meyer tells all, and the color photos will enable you to know the difference.

Did you know that the Horned Crab is one of the oldest living species on earth? It has been around for more than 600 million years, before dinosaurs!

Meyer constantly emphasizes the importance of keeping and protecting all of our sea life. Sadly enough, some of our sea life, such as the Blue Whale is near extinction.

Meyer gives helpful hints to the environmentally smart, such as recycling, saving energy and storing wastes properly, and why preserving our dunes and the sea orts is so necessary.

So, if you want to know more about our beautiful coast and the creatures that live there, get out the Nature Guide to the Carolina Coast. It will make a day at the beach an enlightening experience.

"Quote Of The Week" Stay Home

"Pictures like Hudson Hawk make me as mad as hell. It's beyond ridiculous. But it's no different than our current military spending. All the money we wasted on the military — billions of dollars. The money that would turn hunger around in this country is nothing compared to what we've blown killing, destroying, spying, invading, supposedly protecting. It blows my mind."

Those Crazy Celts Knew How To Party

Ah, Halloween, when little kids get dressed up in scary costumes, walk door to door in the brisk autumn air, and ask for candy.

Ah, Halloween eve, when the bigger kids get dressed up in anything that remotely looks like a costume, stagger bar to bar and ask for beer (same difference). Sometimes you'll even find the older ones getting dressed up, staggering door to door, and asking for treats (usually beer), but they don't seem to get the same results as the smart kids who go from bar to bar. Go figure.

What I want to know is how did all this malarkey get started?

Well, wouldn't you know it, those rowdy Celts, culprits of some mighty hell-raising shenanigans, began the tradition centuries ago to celebrate the last day of the Celtic year.

They believed that on this night, all Hallowes Eve, witches, warlocks and spirits of the dead freely roamed. Those crazy kids thought bonfires would ward off the pesky buggers. When that didn't work, imitation being the highest form of flattery, they begin to dress like them. (I'm sure a few pints of lager had nothing to do with that decision.) By the 19th century, children's pranks took over where intoxicated adult's pranks left off, and thus the tradition of trick or treat began.

Of course, we here in America have added quite a few of our own alcohol inspired traditions.

The carving of vegetables into spooky faces actually originated in Scotland and Ireland, but we being the "bigger is better" nation, insisted that a pumpkin was much better for carving than a turnip. I would tend to agree. A turnip? How in the hell do you carve a turnip?

There is also a lot of folklore surrounding this evening. It is said that children born on this night can freely converse with the spirits. The rest of us have to be content conversing with spirits in liquid form. Damn the luck.

It is also said that you can tell your future by jumping over lighted candles on this hallowed eve. Lighted candles? Now there's a smart thing to play with while your pleased.

If you want to find out who you will marry, stand in front of a mirror at exactly midnight and whoever's face appears behind your left shoulder will be your mate. Now, yes, now, we're getting into the horror of it all.

Another way to find out your mate for life, your ball and chain, is to lock into a hand held mirror while walking backwards down a set of stairs. If you're lucky, you might just make out the image of your insignificant other in the mirror before you trip and plunge to an untimely death. If you are really lucky that special person will be at the bottom of the stairs to break your fall.

I'm not sure where this famous little ditty comes from, perhaps an insecure malicious connoisseur with a foot fetish?

Come Downtown To Hear The Best Of The Latest

BY SHANNON DAVIS
WLOZ Correspondent

Have you noticed local bands are becoming more and more popular at Wilmington clubs? It is the night scene downtown, such as Front Street News, Orion's and Jacob's Run, that is allowing these beginning bands to make their marks.

WLOZ has been trying to help such bands by playing their demo tapes on the air. WLOZ is also booking these local bands to play with some of the more well-known bands that have been playing at WLOZ Night at Jake's.

Some of the local bands getting air-time at the station are SUBURBAN PROPANE, GERMAN, GLOOPY, BRICK BAT, ILLUSIONS OF REALITY and VOODOO SQUID. The latter three have already played Jacob's Run.

Last Saturday night WLOZ presented the bands MY DAD IS DEAD, PRISON SHAKE, and the local band ILLUSIONS OF REALITY. IOR, a big contrast to the other two bands, was a bit more thrashy, while PRISON SHAKE and MY DAD IS DEAD provided sounds you would probably enjoy hearing in a small, dark, mellow pub.

If you would like to hear these local bands' music, you can pick up your very own copy of their tapes at School Kids Records.

WLOZ openly welcomes any demo tapes from local bands that have yet to grace us with their presence. The tape must be of good quality, chrome or metal with no stickers. Oh, and don't tear the tabs out because, uh, that reduces the fidelity.

Don't miss the next WLOZ night on November 7th with TAR and HEAD OF DAVID. Come downtown and get "culturalized" with us. Even if you're not crazy about the bands, they usually provide an entertaining musical experience.

For example, last Friday FINGER and GOD BULLIES played. I wouldn't exactly call their music enjoyable or pleasing to the ear, but they did stage an interesting show.

Hope to see you at the next WLOZ night at Jacob's Run. And remember to stay in tune to WLOZ.

Experts Call For More Research On Atlantic Red Tides

BY ROSS GELBSPAN
Boston Globe

NEWPORT, R.I. — The world's oceans are experiencing an explosion of algae blooms such as toxic red tide, and some scientists believe the phenomenon is an early warning of a massive ecological breakdown.

Red tide has periodically infested New England waters since it first appeared in the mid-1970s.

While the precise cause of the blooms is the subject of much speculation, a majority of 325 scientists who met here this week at a conference said they have abandoned the previous view of the outbreaks as localized, episodic nuisances. Researchers from 44 countries called for urgent attention to the problem by the world's governments.

Several, however, challenged the majority view and argued that the increase in the algae blooms is part of a natural cycle dating back at least 2,000 years.

But even in the cyclical view, the researchers said, the problem could have catastrophic effects on fisheries and aquaculture, the "farming" of marine species that is increasingly a source of the world's food supply.

"I think we can safely compare the explosion of blooms we are seeing to gasps from the proverbial canary in the coal mine. There is no doubt something very significant is happening," said Professor Lars Edler of Sweden's Lund University.

"There is a profound increase in the reported incidence of phytoplankton blooms in the Pacific, the Adriatic, the Atlantic, the Caribbean, the Baltic Sea, the North Sea, everywhere. At the same time, we are seeing a marked shift, with a high percentage of previously benign algal blooms becoming toxic," said Dr. Theodore Smayda of the University of Rhode Island.

While evidence of increasing outbreaks of red tide accumulates, however, the cause remains a mystery. Some attribute the explosion of blooms to the oceans' becoming overloaded with nutrients poured into the seas and spread by human activity, while others see it as an early by-product of global warming.

New algae blooms are being reported from points as diverse as North Carolina, California, Iceland, Finland, Japan, Thailand and Tasmania, and a growing proportion of recent blooms have involved toxic outbreaks. For example:

—Hundreds of pelicans and cormorants in Monterey Bay, Calif., were found in September to have been poisoned by an algae-produced toxin, that the birds absorbed by eating contaminated anchovies.

—Two years ago, 13 humpback whales found dead on the beaches of Cape Cod were diagnosed as having died from toxins in phytoplankton, the scientific term for microscopic plants or planktonic organisms that live in the sea.

—In 1987, a new, virulent toxin found in shellfish, killing three people and acutely poisoning 153 others on Prince Edward Island, Canada, after they ate contaminated blue mussels from an aquaculture farm. The diagnosed cause of the ailment was amnesic shellfish poisoning.

—A recent outbreak of a toxic algae bloom in Guatemala led to 26 deaths and 185 cases of illness.

It is the worldwide explosion of algae blooms that most puzzles the scientists. Some researchers see it as evidence of the oceans' inability to absorb any more nitrogen — from airborne emissions from autos and power plants, agricultural fertilizer runoff and organic wastes from a burgeoning human population.

But others believe the phenomenon is a symptom of global warming, involving shifts in coastal wind and ocean current patterns. Those shifts may in turn lead to new patterns of upwelling from the ocean floor that contribute to the growth of the algae, which are made up of colonies of microscopic sea plants known as dinoflagellates.

Patricia Tester, a researcher at a National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration facility in North Carolina, said her agency's monitoring program, following an unusual bloom off the North Carolina coast in 1988, suggested that new "meanderings" of Gulf Stream currents were responsible. She said such current changes may be linked to atmospheric warming.

Still others see the spread of red tide as the consequence of a recent explosion in shipping, with huge freighters spreading the blooms from ocean to ocean by taking on algae-bearing ballast water in one port and discharging it in distant ones.

However, a smaller number of researchers pointed to fossil sediments that suggest large algae concentrations during a 1,000-year warming period that began around the first century AD. They see the phenomenon as part of natural climatic cycles largely unrelated to the impact of civilization.

The impact of the outbreaks on the world's supply of food has some ecologists especially worried.

Einar Dahl, of Norway's Institute of Marine Research, said the effects of the algae on aquaculture could be catastrophic. He reported that researchers monitoring the effects of red tide in Norway found that blooms they studied killed 20 percent of salmon, nearly 23 percent of rainbow trout and up to 100 percent of cod being raised in the affected areas.

The one point on which all at the conference emphatically agreed is the need for an urgent program of expanded research.

"What has happened is a dawning realization of the magnitude of what we're seeing," Smayda said. "What is needed now is a whole new level of research, using all available tools and technologies, to learn the real magnitude and impact of these events on all the various ecological systems in the oceans."

students in mid or late January.

The money to open the store was borrowed from SGA funds which were allocated to a project to provide legal services to students. The funds will be paid back from bookstore profits. Mitchell admitted that no plan was made to pay the funds back if the bookstore lost money.

Mitchell said the bookstore will "probably not" lose money, but he said it was possible. "I don't think we're going to have any problems," he said.

Doug Hoffman, who is a professor of marketing and has looked into issues involving the University Bookstore, said that the SGA bookstore is a mixed blessing.

Hoffman said that the University Bookstore uses some of its profits to provide scholarships to students on campus. He said that while students may save money on books, "At the same time they're cutting their own throats" by reducing the scholarship fund.

Hoffman also said that the SGA bookstore might not take off at first. "It's going to be rocky at first because people have to learn to trust the system,"

He said that allowing students to name their own price for books they are selling might result in a wide price range for the same textbook, but he said prices would stabilize as students became accustomed to the system.

University Bookstore Manager Arnold Siko said that he doesn't object to the new store. In fact, he said that the University Bookstore will provide SGA with a list of the textbooks to be used on campus next semester.

Mitchell said that he laid the groundwork for the new bookstore, but SGA Bookstore Chair Christy Gunnell has taken over the operation. "She is doing a really good job," he said.

Costs

student centers and services are also frequently cited.

After his inauguration last week, Harvard president Neil L. Rudenstine said that prices will continue to climb, but that the solution is to provide more financial aid. Those who can afford it would pay the full freight, and those who cannot would get assistance.

John Silber, president of Boston University, said another possible solution to soaring college costs may be to crack down on faculty compensation. Universities should insist that professors teach more classes — the best now often have only a two-course teaching load — so fewer professors would be needed, thus reducing the personnel budget.

Whatever steps are taken, Silber does not believe that lopping off one year is the right approach. A high-quality college education simply requires four years, he said.

"You can cut one year off, but it's only three-fourths of a college education," Silber said. "It's like saying a good way to lose weight is to cut yourself off at the knees."

Researchers May Develop A Birth Control Pill For Males

BY BRODERICK PERKINS
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

For four months, a 34-year-old Tennessee male nurse endured daily shots of an experimental anti-hormone drug to stop his sperm production. The shots kept his wife from getting pregnant without taking birth control pills. When he stopped the shots, his sperm count returned to normal.

A 35-year-old Indiana biomedical engineer had a plug inserted in his sperm duct for six months. His wife didn't get pregnant, and when the experimental plug was removed, there was every indication his fertility would have returned. He then had a previously planned vasectomy.

A 26-year-old Washington father of two boys traded his condoms for experimental weekly hormone injections. Sterile for six months, he enjoyed spontaneous sex with his wife until March. Then the trial ended, the shots stopped and his sperm production resumed.

These three men and the experimental strategies they helped test are on the brink of a revolution in contraception — a safe, reversible "male pill."

The nickname is a misnomer because a pill's concentrated dose makes it too toxic to be safe. But whatever form a new male contraceptive takes, it will be the first since mass-produced condoms became possible 150 years ago with the advent of vulcanized rubber.

Such a drug could be on the market by the year 2000, scientists say — if research budgets increase. But at current funding levels, it could take twice as long.

Historically, the pharmaceutical industry has heavily funded birth control studies for women, but that hasn't been the case for men.

Here's why:

—Liability. The greatest barrier to developing new contraceptives is the risk of lawsuits, according to "Development of Contraceptives — Obstacles and Opportunities," a 1990 report by two federal agencies, the National Research Council and the Institute of Medicine.

The pharmaceutical industry hasn't forgotten what happened to A.H. Robins Co. in the 1970s, when nearly 200,000 women using Robins' Dalkon Shield intrauterine device complained of injuries ranging from infections to sterility. The settlement cost the firm $2.5 billion. Then it went bankrupt.

—The graying of America. The pharmaceutical industry, along with the rest of the medical community, has turned substantial attention to the concerns of an aging population.

"I think we should have a well-stocked contraceptive supermarket, where men and women can pick and choose," said Carl Djerassi, the Stanford University chemistry professor who pioneered development of oral contraceptives for women in 1960. "But we are in a geriatric society, not a pediatric one. We are worrying about heart disease, cancer, inflammatory diseases, not contraception."

—Marketability. Even if male contraceptives become cheap and simple, will men, whose bodies aren't at risk for pregnancy, bother to take them? And can women trust them?

"Think about how hard it is to get these Joes to use a condom when they know they could die from a coital act," says Gabriel Bally, director of the contraceptive development branch of the National Institutes of Health in Washington, D.C.

NIH is one of a handful of agencies that finance virtually all U.S. male contraceptive research. Along with NIH, the United Nations' World Health Organization and the U.S. Agency for International Development's Contraceptive Research and Development (CONRAD) program provide financing and administrative assistance to research facilities.

Ortho Pharmaceutical Corp. in Raritan, N.J., is the only U.S. company researching male contraceptives. And its work is limited to screening new compounds for possible animal experiments, said Rich Salem, a company spokesman.

The spare government and private financing supports medical schools, private medical centers and research clinics.

That research has generally focused on two approaches. One, the use of hormones or anti-hormones to fool the reproductive system into shutting down, could cost an estimated $100 million to perfect. The other, a silicone implant designed to work like a reversible vasectomy, could cost $16 million to $20 million.

But the annual combined NIH and CONRAD budgets for male contraception studies are only $3.75 million, a pittance considering it costs more than $3,000 to send one man through a clinical trial, NIH's Bally said. Female contraception research gets twice that amount — $7.5 million annually.

With research so limited, no fundamentally new contraceptive has reached the U.S. market since the woman's birth control pill was introduced 31 years ago. In fact, while dramatic gains have been made in the past five years in understanding male reproduction and how to short-circuit the process, women's birth control continues to dominate budgets and national debate.

Yet for twice the money, female contraceptive researchers are only revamping old ideas. The contraceptive implant Norplant, for example, was approved by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration late last year and hailed as America's first new birth control method since the Pill. But the contraceptive is merely another method of administering synthetic progesterone — the same drug used in women's oral contraceptives.

Some researchers hope that support from the pharmaceutical industry might come serendipitously, as a lucky breakthrough in a related research area.

For instance, Syntex Corp., a Palo Alto, Calif.-based pharmaceutical company, is studying a drug treatment for prostate cancer. The cancer is aggravated by testosterone and experimental drug reduces testosterone levels — just as some experimental contraceptives do.

The pharmaceutical industry also must consider whether cultural and biological obstacles will prevent male contraceptives from being as lucrative as those for women.

Contraceptives were originally developed in part because women wanted responsibility for their own bodies. Will they trust men with that responsibility?

"It's the woman who is subject to pregnancy. (Women) want to know they are in charge," says Roberta Syntex, spokeswoman for the Planned Parenthood Federation of America.

It's also been a lot easier to prevent the fertilization of one egg a month in a woman than it is to stop the 200 million to 400 million spermatozoa found in each man's ejaculation, said Dr. Laun Tom, an endocrinologist at Harbor-UCLA Medical Center in Torrance, Calif.

Problems remain with experimental male contraceptives' side effects and methods of delivery.

Even the best have side effects: that include weight gain, allergic reactions, loss of libido and possibly even heart and liver disease.

Researchers also haven't been able to overcome the toxic effects of a contraceptive concentrated in pill form. So all current experimental drugs are administered through daily or weekly injections — an inconvenience customers probably won't be willing to accept.

Undaunted, researchers say they can make an effective, easy-to-use male contraceptive. But without increased financial support, research will drag on beyond the end of this century, said Dr. Spyros Pavlou, an endocrinologist who directs male contraceptive research at Vanderbilt University Medical Center in Nashville.

"If we had all the money we need, we could have a male contraceptive in the next five or six years," he said.

time to have an election. People are thinking about finals.

Senator Victor Brown said that students are not necessarily familiar with the candidates and are "just checking in names on the ballot."

Person said that the people who checked in Brown's name were voicing their opinions and putting their faith in him and that the power was not with the Senate to make a choice like the one facing them. "Students have a voice in the leadership of the school," Person said.

Person also said that he places more faith in the students and their choices.

Proponents of the special election point out that that Graham was appointed as a special senator. Graham was then job. "Running for the office is a possibility," he said.

If there is no resolution to the situation, Graham anticipates appointed as president pro tempore by the senate. If Graham is appointed to the office of vice president, he will have gotten there without any voice from the students. "The vice president is popularly elected by the students. There is a possibility that he (Graham) could become president without having been elected," Person said.

Graham said, "If I am offered the job, I would take it. I can do the becoming vice president, as he says the constitution states. The constitution committee is looking for a solution so the problem can be fixed permanently. Royal said. For now Graham, Williams, Person and Royal have said that they do not know what will happen.

Another thing that the senators agree on is that the meeting was filled with confusion and tension. Graham said that some of the senators took Royal's opinion as Attorney General to be law.

Royal said that SGA is interested in having the opinions of the students on the matter. "I have office hours if anyone wants to call."

Person also encouraged students to call the SGA and voice their opinion.

Royal said that the motion, even though it failed, can be reconsidered by the senate and that all that is needed for the motion to pass is a three-quarters majority of vote. Graham said, "I'm with the senate. If the amendment passes, I'm with it."

Seven Blissful Nights Glued To A TV Set

Bravo! Bravo!
What more can one say after watching probably the most entertaining and exciting World Series in history?

Now, I know what some of you are thinking. You're saying, "What about the 1975 Series between the Boston Red Sox and the Cincinnati Reds?" Now, that was an exciting series.

How can you ignore these dramatic nail-biting games? How can you discard great players like the Red Sox's Fred Lynn, Luis Tiant, and Carl Yastrzemski? They thrilled a nation with their diving catches and clutch hitting.

Did the miracle finish in the 12th-inning of Game 6 slip your mind? The world watched Red Sox slugger Carlton Fisk control his blast with his hands from home plate, pushing it to fall just inside the foul pole and force a Game 7 of the Series. How can you dismiss all this greatness?

It is simple. I was only five-years-old at the time and don't recall the '75 Series too well. I've heard about the great Series through my father and older colleagues in the field. I've watched the highlights on ESPN but, somehow I've never watched a perfect Series, fan wise, until now.

The World Series that pitted the Minnesota Twins and the Atlanta Braves had all the drama of the '75 Series and more. Don't believe me? Well, step back while I examine the best World Series ever.

The Teams:

Two, yes, two last place teams from the '90 season made the Fall Classic this year. The best sports stories are those of no-name forgotten individuals and organizations that, against all odds, rise to the top. Everybody loves a Cinderella story. This year we had not one, but two, long-shots make the final dance. The Twins were given odds, of 100-1 by Las Vegas bookies. The Braves were given a lesser chance, a 120-1 shot.

Close Games:

Five, count them, five of the seven Series games were decided by one run or less. The final teams at bat decided the winning margin in each one. Three contests went into extra innings, including Game 7, which the Twins won in the 10th inning. That's enough nail-biting to make a manicurist cry.

A bounce here, a hit there, one less base running error, and the Braves are the World Champions instead of the Twins. It was that close.

Dramatics:

Hooo! Boy! Where does one start? How about improbable hitters coming through in the clutch? Minnesota's eighth and ninth hitters, Scott Leius and Greg Cagne hit game-winning home runs in the Series first two games. Atlanta's Mark Lemke, a .225 lifetime hitter, knocked in a RBI single to bring in the winning run in Game 3. Lemke then scored the game winner in Game 4. He led off the 12th inning with a triple and scampered home on a sacrifice fly, barely avoiding the tag.

Speaking about close shaves at the plate, let's not forget the five confrontations in this Series at the most important base in baseball, the one where potential runs count. It was here where catchers truly went every which way but "loose."

Atlanta's catcher Greg Olson was flipped on his head by Twins Shortstop Dan Gladden in Game 1. Twins catcher Brian Harper received a stiffer challenge in Game 4, being flattened by hard-charging Brave Lonnie Smith.

The crushing sounds and flying bodies will be replayed in our minds again and again. Crush! Splat! Ooooooh!, and "yur" still out of there.

Dare we dismiss the shot that put the Twins in position to win it all? Kirby Puckett slugged a Charlie Leibrandt fastball over the left-centerfield fence in the bottom of the 11th to pull out a dramatic 4-3 victory for Minnesota, and force a Game 7.

Puckett even set up his own heroics by somehow reaching Ron Gant's smash before it hit the Metrodome's wall in the fifth inning. Puckett stole a sure double from the Brave preventing a Atlanta runner on second from scoring.

The Atmosphere:

Whether it was "tomahawk chop" or "homer hankies twirl," there was no doubt who's home park it was. The fans were loud, supportive, and on their feet on every pitch. The tension was high each night as the players fed off the emotional atmosphere, making that extra effort to reach the ball with their glove or bat. The home team won every contest, refusing to yield a loss in front of their home crowd.

What the Twins and Braves did yield was a World Series that will be talked and debated about for years. And who knows, maybe twelve years later say so will watch the '91 Series on ESPN and ask me, "Dad, was that the greatest World Series you've ever seen?"

Fondly recalling the games once more in my mind, I'd say, "It was son. Oh it was!"

UNCW Football Club Suspended

BY PATRICK FOWLER
Sports Editor

There will be no pigskin tossing on the UNCW campus for awhile, perhaps permanently.

The Student Activity Office placed the UNCW Football Club on suspension, Monday, Oct. 21 and unless team members file the proper insurance forms with the office by Nov. 1 the team could be disbanded.

"I really didn't want to do it," sports club advisor Frank Tascone said. "I didn't want to be the one who closed them down, but I was more than lenient with them."

The squad was shut down for failing to complete both university requirements for liability releases. UNCW requires club members to sign both a waiver release and show proof of medical health insurance. The football squad failed to complete the latter request.

"I even checked at other schools to see if my request was unreasonable," Tascone said. "They (the schools) had the same requirements we did."

Tascone stated he tried several times to receive the necessary insurance forms from the organization through both verbal and written requests, but met with little success.

"That is the school's policy," football club president Chris Peer said. "I wish that the team would have followed it. It seemed to me that they didn't take the forms seriously. I don't blame Frank, he gave us ultimatum after ultimatum. I would have shut us down if he hadn't."

Tascone stated he informed all clubs including the football organization about the necessary forms he and the university needed at a Sports Club Council meeting on Sept. 5. Tascone said he later contacted Peer on Oct. 3 about deficiencies in the football players insurance forms.

"Chris promised me that all the football players had health coverage and would turn them in," Tascone said. "I figured since most of the players would be going home for fall break (that they would be able to get the medical insurance information from their parents.)"

The players did not, and again Tascone spoke to Peer about the team's violation of university policy. Peer explained to Tascone that he was still having trouble obtaining the photo copies of health insurance and asked if he would address the club at practice.

Tascone completed, setting a final deadline of Oct. 21 for completion of the missing forms. He did allow the squad to compete in an Oct. 29 contest against Appalachian State.

When only two of 22 players met the Monday deadline, Tascone suspended the club. The suspension denies the organization from access to both the university fields and their office space in the student union.

The suspension has caused the squad to forfeit a Oct. 27 home contest to University of North Carolina at Charlotte. A forfeited game, according to the North Carolina Club Football Association's by-laws denies a club member from participating in the league's play-offs.

"We are going to try to appeal that ruling if we can play our last two games," Peer said. "We will appeal the rule because we were forced to forfeit the game, not by choice. However to do this we have to get the insurance forms in soon."

Time is running out for the Seahawks as Duke University is slated for the squad on Nov. 2.

"The league knows our problem and is tentatively allowing us to keep our schedule," Peer said. "However, I have to let Duke know if we have a game by Thursday."

Tascone said if the squad turns proof of medical insurance policies in that he will lift the suspension.

However, the Blue Devils are not the big problem the team faces Nov. 2.

The NCCFA requires members to pay yearly dues of 700 dollars on that date. The club pays the league dues from a Student Government Association fund. Presently the UNCW Club Football's account is frozen. The SGA froze it after the club was suspended.

If the football team cannot pay its league membership dues it will be expelled from the league.

An expulsion could spell the end of the squad. The team, without financial support, would cease to function and would likely disband. Should the organization try to reorganize after dissolving, it would have to re-apply to be a club through the Student Organization Committee.

The team will learn its fate Friday.

Season Changell

The cold weather isn't the only brisk change you'll discover at UNCW in the winter months. Soccer, volleyball, and cross-country, are winding up their fall seasons, giving way to the winter sports of swimming and basketball. The Seahawk swimmers finished second at the South Carolina Relays in an exhibition meet. UNCW faces Old Dominion in Norfolk, Va. The men's basketball team begins exhibition play Nov. 7 against Kentucky Sports Crusade. The first official game for the squad is Nov. 23 against Mount Olive.

Jim Clark's N.F.L. Picks...

Guru Running Scared After Last Picks

I'm going to forget about last week. I don't ever want to talk about last Sunday. First off, the Braves lost, then the Saints, and the Giants, and then Tampa Bay. I am going to simply forget last Sunday.

SAN FRANCISCO AT ATLANTA: They're playing in Atlanta because they had to play their week 7 match-up in S.F. because of the Braves (ugh!). Even though the Falcons won on the road, I think that was the Niners' wake-up call. Niners 24-16.

CLEVELAND AT CINCINNATI: If Boomer plays, the Bengals win. If he doesn't, they don't.

DETROIT AT CHICAGO: The Bears still don't have a great offense, but the Lions don't play well on grass. Bears 24-10.

GREEN BAY AT N.Y. JETS: The Jets, unbelievably, are headed to the play-offs if they can play 500 ball the rest of the year. They'll win this one 24-20.

HOUSTON AT WASHINGTON: The 'Stinks are so tough at home. They are undefeated and headed to the Super Bowl. Houston will throw a major stumbling block in their way. A real offense is something the Skins haven't seen this year. Oilers 31-27.

MIAMI AT INDY: Colts haven't won since the troops went to Kuwait and won't break that streak this week. Miami 21-6.

NEW ENGLAND AT BUFFALO: The Patriots will have the ball longer than the Bills, but that will be the only stat they'll lead in. Bills 35-10.

NEW ORLEANS AT L.A. RAMS: Jim

Everett has had a tough year and this weekend won't be any easier, Saints 21-9.

PHOENIX AT DALLAS: The Cowboys will get back on the winning trail and ride the Cards out of town by the score of 24-13.

TAMPA BAY AT MINNESOTA: The Vikings will jump on the Twins' momentum and carve up the Bucs in this post-Hal-Jowen match-up of invaders 28-3.

PITTSBURGH AT DENVER: ESPN game of the week. I still haven't figured out how the Broncos are in first. Maybe by seeing them this week. I'll find out why. Broncos 22-9.

N.Y. GIANTS AT PHILADELPHIA: The Eagles have an outstanding defense and would be play-off bound if they had a healthy QB. They don't and they won't. Giants 26-12.

Attitudes About AIDS Experts Debate Impact of Johnson's Announcement

BY JEAN LATZ GRIFFIN
Chicago Tribune

In the first 24 hours after Earvin "Magic" Johnson announced he was infected with HIV, calls for information doubled at the major AIDS clinic in Washington D.C., stock for a major condom company jumped $8.25 a share, and children as young as 12-year-old Shawanna Smith of the Bronx talked about the need to practice safe sex.

"He may have done overnight — as a strong, popular role model — what the Centers for Disease Control have been unable to do in years of spending millions of dollars on education," said an aide for the House Committee on Government Operations.

"He has touched millions of people, especially young people, who otherwise would not take care of themselves and practice safe sex," the aide said. "He has saved lives."

It is probably true that the impact of a Los Angeles Lakers superstar telling the youth of America to be careful about HIV, the virus that causes AIDS, is immeasurably more powerful than a film, pamphlet or stilted lecture from a public health official.

But, as the shock of Johnson's revelation faded, politicians and AIDS activists were less certain that Johnson's newest endorsement — of the battle against AIDS — would change any votes in Congress or in statehouses across the nation or free up any more funds for research, education and treatment.

"I think this will have a tremendous effect on youth, the group that is the hardest to reach and practicing the most denial," said Dr. Marvyn Silverman, executive director of the American Foundation for AIDS Research, a non-profit organization that promotes AIDS research, prevention and education.

"But I have no illusions," Silverman said. "I don't think it will have any effect on government or produce any more money for research. There are limited funds."

Because there are limited funds, some say there are other diseases and social problems that need

"If there's more I can do to empathize, to make clear what AIDS is... and isn't, I want to go the extra mile."

federal dollars as much as AIDS does. And they question whether more money would find a cure or vaccine any faster.

"We are hit by people in cancer research and all other areas," Silverman said. "Many people say we get too much already."

President Bush, who like his predecessor has been criticized for not doing enough in the fight against AIDS, was asked again Friday in Rome whether Johnson's revelation would make a difference in his approach to the disease.

Bush said he did not like "allegations that I don't care."

"If there's more I can do to empathize, to make clear what AIDS is and what it isn't, I want to go the extra mile," he said, adding that his administration has "increased funding dramatically" for AIDS research.

"I can't say I've done enough," Bush said. "Of course I haven't." How much is enough, how much has already been done, and whether more money will make a significant difference is a matter of intense debate clouded by non-medical issues in perhaps the most politicized illness ever known.

And to expect Johnson to become, in effect, the silver bullet to solve all those conflicting interests and untangle a medical riddle that is more complex than cancer is probably expecting too much, even of a man who led the Lakers to five world championships.

Much has already been done since the first cases of AIDS were reported in 1980.

The cause has been discovered, the modes of transmission have been identified, two anti-viral drugs have been developed and approved by the Food and Drug Administration, and several drugs have been found that ameliorate the effects of the opportunistic AIDS-related cancers and infections that eventually kill. People are now living years with a disease that less than a decade ago killed within months.

But no cure has been found.

Even the drugs that have been approved or are in the experimental stage are not accessible to all who need them because of cost and restrictive clinical trials. In Illinois, for example, the money allocated to pay for the anti-viral drug AZT for those who are indigent will run out before the end of the year.

Women still die faster from AIDS, and no one has studied the disease in them enough to know why. The mystery of how 70 percent of infants born to women with AIDS escape the disease themselves — a mystery that could lead to discovering ways to block the infection — has not been solved.

Beyond research, there are the issues of treatment and care. People who were not poor when they got AIDS become impoverished trying to cope with the disease. Since many do not have families to take care of them, just having a place to live and food to eat can become an overwhelming challenge.

Some want government to pick up the tab for those costs. Others don't.

To organizations like the AIDS Coalition To Unleash Power, better known as ACT-UP, the issue is not just that more money needs to be spent, but that it wants the funds spent more wisely — on a broader spectrum of drugs, in more targeted and frank prevention literature, and in black and Hispanic communities where the disease is spreading quickest.

"The research community has to be more involved in the politics of doing research," said Dr. Iris Long, medical director for ACT-UP in New York City.

"We don't have the money to do all the research we want to do, so it needs to be coordinated," Long said. "We need to look beyond

AIDS at a glance

Approximately 1 million Americans are infected with the HIV virus that leads to the deadly disease AIDS. A look at what AIDS epidemic:

What is AIDS?

AIDS (acquired immunodeficiency virus) is a fatal disease that affects the body's ability to fight off infections by impairing the immune system.

What causes AIDS?

A virus called HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) that destroys the body's white blood cells. Person with HIV may look healthy, but can still infect others.

How AIDS progresses

- Exposure
- Infection with HIV
- AIDS symptoms appear, such as: Daily fatigue, loss of appetite; weight loss; fevers, night sweats; swollen glands; diarrhea; cough; infections such as thrush
- Treatment: No cure, but two drugs are being used to treat AIDS-related illnesses and prolong life

How virus spreads

HIV cannot be transmitted through casual contact. It is most often spread through:

- Sexual contact
- Contaminated needles or syringes shared by drug users
- Infected blood or components
- Pregnant women to the fetuses they are carrying

The 10-year history of AIDS

- 1981: Centers for Disease Control report first cases
- 1982: Disease is named AIDS. Congress allocates $5.6 million for research
- 1984: Scientists isolate human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) believed to cause AIDS
- 1985: Actor Rock Hudson dies of AIDS. Screening of blood banks for HIV begins
- 1986: Surgeon General urges AIDS education, condom use
- 1987: AZT approved as first AIDS drug; Congress

SGA To Hold Special Election

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

The Student Government Association will hold an election in January to replace resigning Vice President Kelli Shafer. This decision came after a three-week senate stalemate concerning the replacement. The Senate chose to hold a special election to fill the vacancy rather than let the president pro tem succeed to the position.

The SGA Constitution will be amended to reflect the change that was made. "It took so long because it is a big change," said Attorney General Lisa Royal. "We were changing the guidelines we live by."

"This time we handed them reasons. We realized that people were confused. There was a lot of misinformation. Senators researched and worked hard to work through this."

Royal is chairperson of the Constitution Committee.

Senator and Constitution Committee member Lee Person added, "The art of confusion was used well during the meetings."

Person said that the election will not be held during exams if Shafer resigns at the last Senate meeting of the semester, which is December 2. Senator Duane "Ziggy" Nix said that having an election during exams would result in low voter turnout.

No one has announced yet that they will run.

Person said during a speech to the Senate that he wanted President Pro Tem Barry Graham to run for the office. "There is nothing personal in this; what has been going on in the senate for the past three weeks against my friend Barry. I wish Barry would run and win," Person said.

"This is not pro-Graham or anti-Graham and it is not appropriate to say so," said Senator Ken Lemon.

Person, Royal and Senator Sean Williams said that the main issue was, "we wanted the students to decide."

Speaking to the Senate, Williams said, "We are a governing body for the students, but the people who put us in office are the people with the ultimate power. The students have a right to choose who is going to govern them. We can't just sit back and say, 'Students don't know what they're doing when they vote. They just check the ballot.'"

"Well, maybe they do just check the ballot. But do you know why they check the ballot? Because they have the right. They have the right to pick up that ballot and check any name they want to — whether they think hard about it or not. Students have the right to vote."

Person and Royal said that they expect Graham to run since he is eligible. Graham ran against Shafer in the spring elections. He said that he is not sure he wants to run. He said that if someone runs that he totally supports, he will back that candidate. Graham said, "I don't want someone to undo all the work that Kelli has done. If I feel that there is a candidate that will do that, I will run."

In a speech to the Senate, Graham said, "I believe in the effectiveness of the Senate. I don't want to be in any position that would compromise the effectiveness of the Senate because I believe in the Senate. I believe that we need to be effective for the students' sake."

"I'm not in this for the money because I lose money in it. I'm

Communication Studies

New Seminar Being Offered

BY JENNIFER WILSON
Staff Writer

Communication for Kids, a new course in the Communication Studies Department, will be offered for the first time in Spring '92. COM 295-03 will meet on Tuesdays and Thursdays from 3:30 p.m.-4:45 p.m. and will count as three credit hours.

The course, taught by Jane Hight McMurry, will be a seminar in which students share communication skills with children from Crossroads of Wilmington. Students who enroll in this course will receive weekly in-class instruction, as well as four to six hours per week working with the Crossroads children as an instructional aide.

Crossroads is an organization that is dedicated to breaking the welfare cycle in impoverished families by working with their children. The organization has determined that by the third grade, the mental attitude of being a failure is firmly planted in a welfare child's head.

Crossroads works with

The course will allow...students to share their acquired communication skills.

kindergarten and first grade children in hopes of diminishing the chances of children growing up with this attitude.

Community volunteers work with these children in areas of English, math and science. A lack of communication skills, however, seems to be a major factor in the continued low self-esteem of the Crossroads children.

McMurry said the Communication for Kids course will allow UNCW students to share their acquired communication skills. Although the community volunteers are meeting with some success, "there is a need for someone with training to work with these children," she said.

The objective of teaching communication skills to children is to boost self-esteem and encourage positive communication between children, family members, teachers and others in the community. Instructional methods will include creative dramatics, role playing, puppets and arts and crafts.

"The course is going to be an easy one because students won't have to read a thousand-page book or have a mid-term exam, but it will also be difficult because they need to spend time working with the children," McMurry said.

The Department of Fine Arts will accept some students in a directed independent study to work with Crossroads. McMurry said she is anxious to have art students who will help make puppets and drama students who will write scripts for role playing. "Kids love make-up and role playing. I hope some creative art students sign up to help in that area," she said. Interested students should see John Myers, chair of Fine Arts, in Kenan Hall 107.

COM 295-03 will not be on the computers at the beginning of pre-registration. It has since been added and is available.

All entries must be received by 12:40:01. No purchase necessary. Void where prohibited. You must be 18 years of age or older to enter.

Campus Briefs...

New Dorm Designed For Campus

The UNCW board of trustees recently approved the hiring of an architectural firm to design an on-campus residence hall to be built sometime in the future.

Sharpe Architects will work with the offices of Residence Life and Housing to design the 200 bed building.

The new residence will be built when the board of trustees decides that university enrollment warrants construction, the university news bureau said.

Collaborative Short Story Published

A short story written by an English professor and his students has been accepted for publication by The Crescent Review.

UNCW Director of Professional and Creative Writing Philip Gerard, and the students in his graduate fiction writing course, Margot Ackermann, Carol Callahan, Wendy Gwathmey, Joy Hewett, Joyce Hollingsworth, Cameron Sperry and Maureen Yoder all contributed to the story.

Galizio Receives Faculty Award

Psychology professor Dr. J. Mark Galizio received the 1991 Award for Faculty Scholarship which is presented to a professor by the faculty to recognize "Excellence in scholarship research, and creativity."

The selection committee noted the quality of Galizio's research and his "efforts to involve students in his research and to extend his research experience into the classroom," a university press release said.

"To me, research and teaching go hand-in-hand, and most of my research activity serves the additional role of providing a learning experience to my students," Galizio said.

Galizio has been on the UNCW faculty since 1976.

Sexual Assault Awareness Week Observed

Sexual Assault Awareness Week is Nov. 18-22. This year's theme is "Sexual Assault: Awareness, Prevention, Your Life!"

UNCW will present several exhibitions and programs relating to sexual assault, all of which are free and open to students and the public.

A keynote address entitled "The Young, the Restless and the Intoxicated" will be given by Deborah Pittman, director of security at North Carolina Wesleyan College in Rocky Mount. Her talk will address miscommunication and differing expectations between men and women that can lead to acquaintance rape.

Self defense classes will be taught by Parker Howey, a black belt in bushin-kai karate. They will be held in Hanover Gym Aerobic Room from 3:30 to 5:00 p.m. on Nov. 18 and Nov. 20.

A presentation on date rape called "So, What's It to Me?" will be given for men only on Nov. 21 at 7:00 p.m. in room 103 of the University Union.

There will also be information tables in the University Union and University Center during the week.

The programs are sponsored by the dean of students office, campus police, Student Team Against Rape (STAR), and the Wilmington Rape Crisis Center.

"Doonesbury" Raises Questions Of Newspaper Policy

Newspapers this week were faced with the question of whether to publish some particularly controversial "Doonesbury" cartoons. This isn't a new decision.

The cartoon's author, Garry Trudeau, has produced work which was often too racist for some editors to put into print.

This week Trudeau came up with a few strips which vaguely raised the possibility that Vice President Dan Quayle may have purchased drugs in the past. Trudeau gave no evidence for the inference, and had no credible source.

When the Wilmington Morning Star and other papers decided not to run the comics, some people declared that Trudeau was being deprived of his first amendment rights to free speech. That is absolutely untrue.

Those who make that argument show that they don't understand the relationship between freedom of speech and the role of a newspaper in society.

Newspapers are independent entities. They have to be. Complete independence is necessary for a newspaper to maintain objectivity in its reporting of the news. If the newspapers were held accountable by some group with an interest in what is published and what is not, then it could not be trusted to pursue truth in reporting.

In the same vein, if the newspaper had an obligation to publish everything submitted, the reader would have no way of discerning what is the truth, what is a half-truth, and what is a lie. That is the job of the newspaper editor: to filter out the truth from a mass of biased or false information.

So, no one has a right to have their writing published in a newspaper. If a person wants to be published in a newspaper, he or she is at the mercy of the editor.

On the other hand, everyone has a right to start their own newspaper.

This idea applies to Garry Trudeau. If an editor decides that Trudeau's strip conveys information which may not be true (in a manner which might be construed as true), that editor has every power to pull the comic.

This idea is not meant to be a power trip for the editors of newspapers. It is simply the only way that we can print news in which you, the reader, can have faith.

Successful Registration Takes Creativity

Well friends, I've got some good news to report this week. No, I did not get that $10 million check from Ed McMahon, or even a $1.00 rebate check from Kellogg's Corn Flakes.

I did not find my name on People magazine's "Ten Best Dressers Of 1991" list, nor did I win the "J. Russell Bumgardner Award For Critical Analysis" for my column on the Clarence Thomas hearings.

But nonetheless, I have some good news to report this week.

You see, I got ALL OF MY CLASSES FOR SPRING SEMESTER. Now you probably think I merely went to the registrar's office and threatened to write nasty things about them in my column if they did not give me the classes I needed. I admit that I did try this, but to no avail. They figured that I would someday write nasty things about them anyway; and who would they be to succumb to my journalistic blackmail?

No, it was not extortion or even my charming personality which allowed me to obtain my perfect schedule. I was however, a product of my very own cunning and wit.

My registration day began bright and early at 8:00 a.m., when I went to Bear Hall to get a good spot on the Official New and Disproved Registration Sign-up Sheet. Although the sign-up sheet was being faithfully guarded by a campus police officer, and by the rules stated that no one could sign up before 8:00 a.m., I noticed that there were already 77 names on the list. I later learned that the campus cop had been lured away earlier by the smell of fresh jelly donuts someone had left down in the math lab. I took the 78th spot on the list and went on to class.

When I returned at around 2:00 p.m. that afternoon, I was surprised to see that they were already up to 93. I decided to go in some reading (Moby Dick, The Grapes of Wrath, and others). I also found great enjoyment in listening to a couple of math majors discussing discrete (or was it concrete? . . . maybe cement?) differential equations. I must have fallen asleep because the next thing I knew, someone was poking my arm and telling me it was my turn to register.

To my dismay I found that almost all of the classes I needed were already closed. I did get a seat in "Organic Gardening For the 1990's" which meets on Fridays from 6:00 to 10:00 p.m. Not getting my classes presented me with a formidable dilemma, but not one that I could not overcome. I knew that I had to go to the registration stations in each department where I needed classes and do whatever necessary to get my classes.

First I went to Morton Hall and explained to them that I was an English major and that I HAD to have my English class or I would be forced to drop out and return home to Dabnum County Community College. There I would only be able to get an Associate Degree in something like "Mortuary Sciences," and all because I couldn't get an English class at UNCW. "One down and two to go," I thought to myself as the secretary pressed the EMERGENCY FULL CLASS OVERRIDE BUTTON and confirmed the class for me.

Then I was off to Friday Hall. I explained to the secretary that I was a biology major and that I absolutely positively had to have my biology class or I would be forced to drop out of UNCW, go to the M.T.A. truck driving school, (taking classes such as "Trucker Talk 101" and "Offensive Driving") and end up with large bunions on my rear from driving back and forth to California. The secretary almost broke into tears as she entered my name into the computer.

After this, I went back to Morton Hall, this time upstairs in the history department. There I explained to the secretary that I was a history major and that the Earth's rotation would come to a screeching halt if I did not get the history class I needed.

Furthermore, I explained to her that if I did not get the class, I would be forced to become a political science major and never be able to do much in life. (Except, of course, for criticizing others' writing.) "We couldn't let this happen," the secretary acknowledged, as she punched in my history class.

My final stop was in Deloach Hall. Again I made my plea that I was a chemistry major and it was imperative that I get the proper chemistry course. "Otherwise," I said, "I will be forced to run down to the organic chemistry lab and bury my head in a large beaker of concentrated sulfuric acid."

She immediately called for a fleet of Campus Police officers to keep me in the room while she punched in my new class. And so my work was done.

While it may be too late this year, I hope that this shed some light on how YOU can get the classes you need the next time we have registration.

Although the registration people have improved their system and made it more difficult for us to get the classes we need, we must adapt and discover new ways to circumvent the system. It's a matter of natural selection.

But for now, GOOD LUCK WITH DROP/ADD!! Until next time . . . keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

Is The Eastern Block Ready For Us?

Donald Trump will host a series of celebrity tours of the region.

secret-nuclear-sub-committees to brief the newly formed governments on the blitz of new information and choices they are about to receive.

Dan Quayle has been named "The Head of Flock Distribution," and his job will be to establish temporary preaching zones for televangelists (No, Mr. Swaggart, Amsterdam is not available). Each televangelist will receive a block (no pun intended) of Eastern Europe with the same number of working televisions and will also receive his own toll-free number.

Dan's job won't be done after the distribution, though. He will also head the arbitration board.

No doubt Oral Roberts, Robert Tilton and others will squabble over leaflets being dropped in opposition territory, phone lines being tied up on purpose, and prostitutes being sent to motel's acting as though they need some pelvic healing.

Donald Trump will host a series of celebrity tours of the region. These newly independent countries have no idea who Donatello, Tortellini, Ravioli, and Leonardo are. Heck, they probably haven't figured out Van Halen's acronym.

These people are so behind in regards to who's hot, only a man of the Donald's stature can organize and publicize a media event of this size.

One of the other culture-evolving seminars that caught my eye was the one taught by Carl Sagan. At first glance, I thought "Billions and Billions" was about intergalactic phenomena. Instead, it explained the plethora of baseball statistics we have today.

Mr. Sagan was able to explain win and loss records on the road and at home, batting averages, and earned run averages. Unfortunately, he was unable to explain why it's important to know Ryne Sandberg's batting average on the road with two men on in the top of the ninth in May with the wind blowing in from right and there is a slight mist in the air.

I'm glad the world is becoming more democratic; I just hope they are ready for us.

Stillpoint with Bob Haywood Re-thinking The Meaning Of 1492

Looking towards Thanksgiving Break, as we plan a trip to share Thanksgiving with some good friends, makes me mindful, once again, of that first Thanksgiving the Pilgrims celebrated in the "new" country.

And that reminds me of "stuff" that I've been reading about next year's 500th anniversary celebration of Columbus discovery of America.

With some relief, I am not reading many calls to celebrate Columbus as a great explorer, a model for humankind and a champion of the faith.

Instead (and appropriately) this anniversary is being marked as a rallying point in history for pointing out the incredible injustice done to the indigenous peoples of the Americas both then (1492) and now (1992). It is an opportunity for these indigenous people to gather to celebrate their journey towards self-development as peoples with inherent rights, and an opportunity for those of us with European ancestry to become aware of the true facts of history so that we might hear and respond to the demands for justice from peoples of the Americas.

When the Spaniards "discovered" the Americas, they found a continent with hundreds of different civilizations. Some of them, such as the Mayan, the Aztecs and the Incas, were highly developed.

However, the European colonists did not respect or admire these peoples or their cultures; there was no "encounter of two worlds."

Rather, the Europeans approached the indigenous inhabitants with racist and ethnocentric attitudes, and much greed.

According to Uruguayan Historian and author, Edward Galeano, when Columbus disembarked in the Caribbean, there were approximately 70 million inhabitants in the Americas. One hundred fifty years later that population had been reduced by more than 90 percent.

Nine out of every ten Indians were dead as a result of torture, slavery, massacres or disease.

The gold, silver and other resources of the American continents were transferred to Europe to fuel the transformation of European economies, while the indigenous population languished with slavery, hunger and destitution.

Death, misery and devastation were visited upon the indigenous people of the Americas all in the name of the crown, of civilization, of progress and of the church.

The Colonial Era is long past, but colonial attitudes remain and the indigenous people of the Americas still suffer for the sake of the white man's progress.

As one contemporary priest put it, "Is the decimation of native populations in Cuba and Haiti by the conquerors any different than the current genocide of the indigenous peoples of Guatemala and Brazil?"

"Is black and native slavery really any different from the strangulation of the poor that is worsening with the debt crisis? Is imperial Europe's greed for the resources of the 'New World' any different than the profit motive that compels transnational corporations to plunder the Third World's resources?"

Most of us are legacies of a distorted view of the origin of our nation that has equipped us with attitudes of white superiority, savior of the poor and illiterate and instigators of mankind's progress; attitudes that are rooted in historical lies.

We cannot change our history and prayers of confession are only useful insofar as they affect our present attitudes towards "peoples of color" and cause us to open our ears to their perspectives on history, both past and present.

That we are all "of one blood" is an inescapable truth with which we had better start dealing for the sake of our collective futures. My hope is that 1992 will see UNCW celebrating the 500th anniversary with a massive teaching about the realities of history—past and present—and collaborative gatherings of people of diverse backgrounds who can contemplate our future together. This would be the very best of what education can be.

It is not about rewriting history. It is about rethinking history in order to create and just a sustainable future.

Letters To The Editor...

Dear Editor,

Let Me Go Out On A Limb . .

In the November 7, 1991 edition of The Seahawk, I feel an unjust stereotype has been created in the article "Some SGA Members Should Learn Respect." Correct me if I am wrong, but one person is not the SGA.

It is not a president; it is not a vice-president; it is not a senator. . . . It is an association, and I feel this must be understood in order for justice to be obtained.

In the article, a "pro-Graham" was noted as saying the . . . students aren't qualified to pick the best vice president. . . . and that the Senate . . . knows better what the students really need."

That is all fine and well, but that is only one person's opinion. The voice of the Seahawk has the audacity to finish the article with a poor attempt at grouping one person's beliefs with that of the Association. . . . When it comes before the Senate again, maybe SGA ought to have a little more respect for the students' representatives."

I'm going out on a limb, but SGA has not made a decision yet, and that statement should have been directed towards the one person who stated it, or if you must direct it toward a group of people, how about the "pro-Graham"ers.

Sincerely,
Line Dempsey,
SGA Public Information Officer

Editor's Note: In fact, SGA has made a decision. However, the Senate vote came after this letter was written.

Duke's Anti-Government Policies Gain Popularity in Louisiana

BY SAM ATTLESEY
Dallas Morning News

CHURCH POINT, La. — The smell of gumbo and the sounds of French accordion music filled the air at the Cajun Day Festival in the heart of Acadiana.

As partysongers stood in small clusters and nursed their beers, the talk turned to Louisiana's race for governor.

Although Cajun Country traditionally has been a stronghold for former Gov. Edwin Edwards, many said they are drawn to challenger David Duke and his anti-welfare, anti-big government, anti-taxes and anti-affirmative action themes.

Critics of Duke, the former Ku Klux Klan grand wizard and Nazi sympathizer, say his message is either phony or racist, or both.

But they concede that his appeal is working across the state, especially among voters who are fed up or frustrated with government.

Duke, a Republican, delivers his message in an articulate, smooth and usually even-tempered manner that opponents say lulls voters into a false sense of security.

That tact got Duke elected to the Louisiana Legislature. It got him 44 percent of the vote in a losing U.S. Senate race last year. And it earned him a spot in Saturday's runoff with Edwards in a race that has focused national attention on Louisiana.

Duke "hits people on a gut level. He gets them mad at government," said veteran political analyst John Maginnis of Baton Rouge.

"He's doing a lot of the same things Huey Long did," Maginnis said, referring to the former populist governor who vowed to make "every man a king."

"But instead of the scapegoat being the rich man, for Duke it's the welfare recipient, and instead of big oil, it's big government. Those are very appealing scapegoats," Maginnis said.

Ed Renwick, a New Orleans political scientist, said Duke's appeal is based on "voter protest."

"Voters feel they've not been listened to by the government. They feel that only minorities and the wealthy have the ear of government," Renwick said.

Edwards, a Democrat and three-term governor whose tenure was marred by legal problems, has sought to shatter Duke's efforts. Edwards has cautioned Louisiana voters not to be deceived by a message of "hate and division."

"He is appealing to your base emotions because he doesn't like a segment of our community," Edwards said at a recent candidate forum. "But when he gets through with them, who will be next? The disabled? The young? The old? You better think about it."

Defeated Gov. Buddy Roemer acknowledged that Duke was able to tap into voter anger in the primary last month, but he said it was done on a phony issue.

"Duke's only theme is welfare, as if that two percent of our budget is killing us. Nonsense," said Roemer, noting that most of the welfare rules are set by the federal government, not the state.

"Louisiana now makes some of the lowest welfare payments in America, 47th out of the 50 states. In fact, we are the leading state in America in welfare reform," said Roemer, a Republican who has declared that he will vote for Edwards in the runoff.

Still, virtually everyone who says they will vote for Duke — and even some supporters of Edwards and Roemer — say they like what Duke says about welfare fraud. But many of them concede that Duke can't do much about it.

"These people are tired of welfare," Maginnis said. "They see it in grocery store lines. Just like Duke says, 'Somebody on food stamps buying hamburger while you are buying hamburger helper.'"

Duke, 41, who ran for governor this year instead of reelection to his House seat from suburban New Orleans, said he has caught on with voters because of "straightforward honesty on issues that people are concerned about."

"They see somebody in me who is not afraid to take a chance and say what I believe," he said.

Duke calls for "equal rights for all Americans, not affirmative action for a few."

He wants to require "able-bodied welfare recipients to work for their welfare checks."

He wants "drug dealers and abusers out of public housing and off the welfare rolls."

He wants "unmarried welfare recipients to act morally and responsibly as a condition to accepting taxpayer subsidized public assistance."

He says government is too big, too corrupt and too expensive for taxpayers. But he says welfare fraud is at the root of most of the state's problems.

"Unless we reform the welfare system in our state, we have no future because fewer and fewer people are pulling the economic wagon and more and more are riding in it," he says in almost every speech and debate.

The elderly, the veterans are not getting the help they need. At the same time, the system encourages people to have illegitimate children, to act irresponsibly."

The message is appealing to many, including the folks who live around the swamps and bayous of Cajun Country, mostly in south-central Louisiana.

At the Cajun Festival, Hilton Thibodeaux of Richard, La., said he was voting for Duke because of his stand on welfare.

"I'm 75. I'm disabled. I can't work no more. He wants to put the young ones that can work to work," Thibodeaux said.

Scott Thibodeaux of Baton Rouge said he likes "everything" about Duke. "One of the strongest points I agree with Mr. Duke is that the government is just too big. It needs to be shrunk down to reality," he said.

Near New Iberia, a small gray clapboard house doubles as a David Duke campaign headquarters and One God Pentecostal Church.

Campaign literature is mixed with hymn books and Bibles. There are Duke posters and a banner proclaiming "Simply Jesus" hanging on the walls.

Wearing a "Duke for Senate" gimme cap, the Rev. H.W. Geisendorff says he is a Duke supporter because of his conservative philosophy.

"Things have gone so far left, it's going to take someone far right to bring it into moderate focus," he said.

"He's not against any race of people, he's for equality for all," the minister said. "Since the civil rights movement in the South, the white person is sinking down into the position the blacks were when this first started."

Geisendorff said he would not be supporting Duke if he were not convinced that he is a "repentant sinner-turned-Christian."

Duke says he has put behind him his activities with the Klan and with neo-Nazi groups because he has matured, become more

Much To Do And See At St. John's

BY CASEY NEEL
Entertainment Writer

If you weren't at St. John's Museum of Art last Sunday, you missed a great show! A five-man jazz band composed of UNCW students and our own music professor, Michael Scott kept the crowd's feet tapping.

This five-man band featured Andy Whittington on piano, Brad Davis on tenor sax, Jeff Mason on bass, Jay Alred on drums, and Michael Scott on trombone. They will perform again this Sunday, at 2:00p.m.

Although the museum's Sculpture Garden provided a very serene, "hands folded" atmosphere, the crowd still snapped their fingers while children danced in the aisle to such tunes as Miles Davis' "So What" and the tune "Autumn Leaves." They also played an exciting original composition written by Scott that he calls "Strange Changes." Scott urged the crowd to participate, saying it was okay if they felt the urge to holler.

After the concert, most of the audience was in the mood to check out the Walter O. Evans Collection of African American Art that surrounded them. Tiffany Lee, St. John's curator of education said, "there is a definite connection between visual arts and jazz."

The Evans collection features paintings and sculptures of such artists as Charles White, Romare Bearden, Elizabeth Catlett, Georges Latarte, Edward M. Bannister and many others. One of my personal favorites was an oil painting called "Staircase" by William Harper.

The collection will be at St. John's through Dec. 1. If you haven't seen it, go check it out. There's a lot to see, so plan to hang around for awhile.

For those of you who want to learn more about African-American cultural heritage, be at St. John's on Nov. 15th. UNCW's own Dr. Sherrill Martin will be presenting a lecture series entitled "From Deep River To Peel The Spirit: A Study In Spirituals." It will be held in Hughes' Gallery at 11:00 a.m. Don't miss it!

Also during the week of October 13-19, St. John's will be featuring a celebration of the life and work of visionary artist, Minnie Evans. Her exhibit will be available for purchase in the studio theatre at Thalian Hall.

There are a lot of great things happening at St. John's Museum of Art. (Located on the corner of Orange and 3rd — across from the Community Center.) For more information, contact Tiffany Lee at 763-0281. It's a colorful way to spend any afternoon.

Rent A Video Tonight

Fantasia: This Disney classic originally made in the Forties, is now being offered on video. As U.S. magazine points out, it won't exactly triumph over the MTV or Nintendo generation, but it is definitely worth a lookie-look. If you really enjoy it you will find it is a very affordable buy, especially for a Christmas gift. (Hint, hint.)

Mortal Thoughts: Demi Moore not only stars but produces this suspenseful thriller. Her real-life husband, Bruce Willis does such a good job at playing the low-life husband that you're more than happy to see him... well, rent the movie and find out. I was really surprised at how good this movie was. Rent it.

Barton Fink Demands Audience's Attention

BY ZACHARY BISACKY
Entertainment Writer

The absence of truth and human nature in the current cinema has been painfully shocking. So far, the majority of films have created circumstances and themes that have been explored countless times, leaving the viewer about as inspired and moved as if he had read an essay on gun control.

The first film this year to provide a catalyst between viewer perceptions and experiences, and has the ability to dent even the most frigid of minds, is the latest release from the Coen brothers, Barton Fink.

As you may know from their past works (Blood Simple, Raising Arizona, and Miller's Crossing), the Coens do not operate within the spectrum of the commonplace. This film, which walked off with top prizes at the Cannes Film Festival, is the humorous story of a writer, Barton Fink (John Turturro) who suffers from writer's-block in Hollywood, circa 1941.

Due to his success as a New York playwright, Fink is offered a contract to write screenplays for Capitol Pictures. Once in L.A., he checks into the shabby, grim-looking Hotel Earl and then meets with the studio chief, a vigorous, pragmatic beast named Lipnick (a perfectly cast Michael Lerner) who assigns Fink to write a wrestling picture based on Walter Berry.

Fink finds little success at writing the script while holed up in his seedy, claustrophobic hotel room. Everything in the creepy atmosphere distracts him, including strange moaning voices from the adjoining room. After days of futile concentration, he can only come up with the opening scene. That is, until his next-door neighbor, a traveling insurance salesman named Charlie Meadows (John Goodman), stops over and offers to help.

Meadows demonstrates a few wrestling moves for Fink and then tries to tell him about his life on the road. But Fink doesn't listen. In fact, in all his self-absorbed arrogance, he refers to Charlie as a "common man" and gives his opinions on politics and theater without letting his new acquaintance get in a word edge-wise. Fink is so lost in his isolated vision of an unexperienced reality and his "life of the mind" that he doesn't notice his source of inspiration is sitting right in front of him.

Turturro plays the leftist intellectual in a way that anyone who has ever tried to put words on paper can identify with, and Goodman contributes an equally captivating performance.

The film demands all the viewer's attention and forces one to shovel through a constant influx of symbolic dialogue and camera work to find the characters' true nature. The most engaging surrealistic effects are introduced in the hotel sequences, in which the camera pans slowly down its long, deserted corridors and depicts its anemic employees.

Some angry critics say the Coens only hide the film's hollow meaninglessness and show off their technical prowess with these bizarre camera angles. It's an allegation that might have validity among their prior works, but in the case of this film, which contains powerful, humanistic insights, it is easily refuted.

Consequently, Barton Fink is one of the few films in many years to scour the rusty gears of the mind in a way that is engaging and insightful, as well as comical.

Guitar-Slinger Richie Sambora Solos Beyond Bon Jovi's Top Forty Fodder

BY PATRICK MACDONALD
Seattle Times

Richie Sambora is best known as the black-haired guitar-slinger in Bon Jovi.

But his new solo album, "Stranger In This Town," shows he's more than just a flashy sideman. He's also a talented singer, songwriter and producer with more artistic range than his Bon Jovi work would indicate.

One of the ballads on the record, "The Answer," reveals a maturity and sensitivity beyond that of Bon Jovi's Top 40 fodder. And "Mr. Bluesman" demonstrates that Sambora can throw himself into a song with the same energy he brings to Bon Jovi guitar solos.

While Sambora continues to be a member of Bon Jovi — which will record a new album early next year — he's concentrating now on his solo career, opening his first solo tour Monday (Nov. 11) in Seattle.

"It's been a dream of mine over a lifetime," he said, talking from his home in New Jersey.

He said he's been saving some songs — like "The Answer" — for years, just waiting for the opportunity to do them on his own.

"They just didn't seem correct for the kind of music Bon Jovi does," he explained. "These songs are a little bit more artistic. They just don't fit Bon Jovi's genre."

But the first single, "Ballad of Youth," wouldn't be out of place in a Bon Jovi concert. It's a mainstream rocker with an uplifting, believe-in-yourself lyric. It isn't getting much radio airplay, but the video is attracting attention.

"MTV is keeping me alive right now," Sambora said. "It's been in the top 10 requests for the last eight weeks or so. Thank God the kids are responding because it makes me happy to know I'm communicating to someone."

He said the vocals on the album were challenging because he hadn't sung lead in years.

"There was a lot of insecurity because I hadn't really done this in 10 years. Before I joined Bon Jovi I was essentially the lead singer in most of the bands I was in. I was the main guy.

"Jon (Bon Jovi) is a supreme communicator in that respect. He's really good at being a front man."

Sambora is borrowing Bon Jovi members David Bryan on keyboards and Tico Torres on drums for his touring band, as well as bassist Tony Levin from Peter Dinklage's band. The band also includes percussionists Crystal Waters and synthesizer-player Dave Arnata.

Sambora said he's been able to maintain some anonymity even while in one of the most popular bands in the world, because Jon Bon Jovi gets most of the attention. But he got a taste of superstar celebrity as Cher's boyfriend last year and early this year.

"That was a little more difficult because whenever we hung out there was like people everywhere and paparazzi and that stuff going on."

"I just talked to her a couple of days ago. She's doing some gigs up at Atlantic City and I'm going to see her."

His concerts, he said, will include Bon Jovi songs, most of the solo album and material he wrote for others, including Cher.

A GEORGE-TO-JOAN LETTER? CAN WE TALK HOAX?

Alas, George "Read My Lips" Bush is not moonlighting as a matchmaker. Joan Rivers received a note on official White House stationery, signed "George Bush," offering an unsolicited presidential recommendation on a suitable suitor for the talk show host's daughter, Melissa.

Staffers at "The Joan Rivers Show" checked with the White House for verification last week and learned it was a forgery. The letter is now in the hands of White House security, with an official no-comment on its contents or the perpetrator.

Before the hoax was revealed, Rivers was open to the possibility of an Oval Office love connection for Melissa. "As long as the last name isn't Quayle, I'm very interested," Rivers quipped.

Arsenio Hall is taking off the gloves in the late-night ratings bout — just as soon as Johnny Carson leaves "The Tonight Show" to Jay Leno next May.

"Instead of striving to be No. 2, my new philosophy will be to strive to be No. 1," Hall said in an interview to air Tuesday on NBC's "First Person with Maria Shriver."

"I have a certain kind of respect for Johnny Carson," the late-night host said. "But when he's gone the word 'respect' will only come out of Aretha Franklin's mouth. It's going to be hardball then."

In the meantime, though, Hall wouldn't mind an invitation to sit on Johnny's couch. "I'd like to do Carson before he goes, you know?" Hall said. "Let me do the show, man."

THE MOORE THRILLS THE MERRIER

Marriage to Bruce Willis is one long roller-coaster ride. Just ask Demi Moore. Willis rented out Six Flags Magic Mountain amusement park in Valencia, Calif., on Saturday night to celebrate his wife's 29th birthday in stomach-clutching, bare-knuckled style.

The guest list included Tom Cruise and wife Nicole Kidman, Jack Nicholson, Sylvester Stallone, Ally Sheedy, Kiefer Sutherland and Keenen Ivory Wayans. The 60 guests were treated to a gourmet meal and birthday cake, just the thing to hit 'em after two hours of non-stop roller coasting.

Three years ago, Willis threw a similarly star-studded bash at Magic Mountain to mark the first anniversary of his marriage. Moore's birthday was Monday.

DIRTY LAUNDRY IS JUST ANOTHER MADONNA WANNA-BUY

Madonna's baseball uniform — unwashed, of course — from the filming of "A League of Their Own" fetched $2,100 at auction Sunday in Evansville, Ind. Construction worker Doug Burton of Boonville, Ind., was willing to pay up to $5,000 for the '40s-style uniform, temptingly pitched by the auctioneer as "still having the scent of a megastar."

Burton's no starry-eyed Madonna fan, though. He's seeing dollar signs — as in the outfit's resale value. Burton hopes to pocket an $8,000 profit from his investment when the movie, which co-stars Tom Hanks and Geena Davis, hits the big screen next year. Auction proceeds will support low-income housing.

QUOTE-UNQUOTE

—"(Columbia) would have paid me as much as I got to produce this movie. ... I know it would have been a nice marketing tool, and it could have gotten a Best Song nomination. But I said, 'I'm tired of singing for my supper. I always have to sing — why, you mean the movie isn't enough? I have to sing now, too?'" —Barbra Streisand, on her refusal to do a "Prince of Tides" theme song. Streisand, who directed, produced and starred in the film, was quoted in Premiere magazine.

—"I think people will be surprised to find out there was some inter-Brady dating, and there were a few drunken golf cart races around the Paramount studios." —former "Brady Bunch" kid star Barry Williams, 37, on his forthcoming book, "Growing Up Brady."

If Johnson's revelation does anything, AIDS activists say, they hope it will change attitudes about HIV and those who suffer from it.

"We have never responded in an appropriate manner, and the reason we have not is we have been able to pretend that people with HIV are others, that they don't relate to us, that it is not about us," said Phil Wilson, coordinator of Los Angeles' AIDS programs.

Ropes Course To Be Built

BY HOLLY PRICE
Contributing Writer

A ropes course, an outdoor adventure and survival test, is going to be built on UNCW's campus in the next couple of months. The Leadership Center's Discover Program has received the money they need to begin construction.

The estimated cost of the project is $11,500. Of that amount $4500 was taken from a grant to the department of Health, Physical Education and Recreation. SGA gave the other $7000 to the project.

The course will be located behind Wagner Hall adjacent to Rose Avenue on six or seven acres of the University's undeveloped land. On Nov. 6 the Outdoor Institute company will be coming down for a site inspection. They will look at the area trees and general geography of the land. "We don't want to have to cut down any trees," said Brock Snyder, programs director for the leadership center. "We want the course to be built into the environment."

The course will consist of twelve to thirteen low element stations. These will be challenges ranging from walking across a telephone pole that is elevated off of the ground to basic exercise. Five or six high element challenges will also be a part of the course. These include the use of rope ladders and cable crossings. Finally the course will end with a high wall that the entire group must climb over.

"We want this to be a useful tool for groups to use to gain leadership and cohesiveness," Snyder said.

The cost of using the course has not yet been decided, however Snyder said the cost would be different for students, department groups, and community groups. The lowest cost being for the students. The money the course earns will go to basic maintenance and repairs.

Groups Save Doomed Puppies

BY MICHAEL BETZOLD
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

DETROIT — Pressure from animal rights activists has convinced Northwest Airlines to cancel Detroit-to-Paris shipments of young beagles to a Swiss laboratory for experiments on the effects of toxic chemicals, an airline spokesman said Monday.

Northwest had sent shipments of 28 beagles each of the past two weeks in flights from Detroit Metro Airport to Paris. A third shipment scheduled for Tuesday and three others have been "put on hold" while the airline investigates charges that the beagles are the subjects of inhumane and unnecessary research.

"We're going to try to figure out what the socially responsible thing to do is," said Northwest spokesman Jon Austin.

Austin said the airline wanted to find out "what these animals are used for and how they're being treated. The concerns that have been raised we'd certainly like to see addressed."

Animal rights groups targeted Northwest for a possible boycott after convincing Swissair in September to stop similar flights transporting beagles from a New York state beagle farm to Research and Consulting Co., a laboratory in Basel, Switzerland. The lab conducts experiments for pharmaceutical companies.

"It looks like the animal activists have put enough pressure on Northwest to change their policies," said Susan Yoh of Defenders of Animal Rights, a Detroit area group involved in the protest.

They focused their protests on the airlines because of their sensitivity to consumer image.

"Airline executives seem to understand that people don't want to fly off on a ski vacation or business trip knowing that in the hold under them are these puppies being shipped off to be cruelly exterminated," said Sandra Lewis, the New York director of Friends of Animals. After learning of Northwest's decision, she said, "It's heartening. I'm grinning from ear to ear for the dogs. I'm hoping if they do investigate this properly they will not take these shipments anymore."

The airline was paid $2,317 for the Metro shipment last week, according to a shipping bill. The airline has a $16,000 contract to continue the weekly shipments through Dec. 3, said an airline employee who has seen that paperwork.

The Kalamazoo, Mich., breeding farm is owned by Hazelton Research Products, the world's largest breeder of dogs for research.

"What we're doing is very right. ... It's for the safety and protection of people," said Russ Robinson, director of the Kalamazoo farm.

Before Northwest confirmed the shipments had been cancelled, Robinson said he didn't understand why the activists were focusing on Northwest because his company used other airlines to send dogs to research labs. He did not identify them.

Defenders argue that animal research is vital to understanding causes of and developing cures for human diseases. Officials from the drug companies who use the Swiss lab could not be reached for comment.

Dr. Christopher Anderegg of Basel, who once worked for a Swiss puppy farm that was owned by the lab where the Hazelton puppies were headed, said hundreds of beagles were used each year for toxicology studies.

Anderegg said the dogs were fed toxic substances and then monitored. At the conclusion of the experiments they are destroyed.

SGA Person of the Week

I've been reading the Seahawk over the past couple of weeks, and I feel that one member of the Student Government needs to be recognized. This guy has really been busting his butt.

He was a brother of mine, back in the old fraternity days, well... he would have been a brother of mine, but I was getting out as he was getting in. I didn't really know him well at the time. The next year he moved into Graham Hall, and I bumped into him more often. He always seemed to be involved with some form of government of some sort.

The next summer, I obtained the job of Public Information Officer and found out that I would be sharing an office with him. Yet still, I really did not know him. Now, after many long executive board meetings, I know who he is and how dedicated he is.

Dedicated yes. Every Sunday I stop by the office after playing table tennis to check my messages. Every Sunday I do this, he's here in the office working away.

You've probably read his name over the past couple of weeks... He implemented the plan of the SGA Consignment bookstore and was interviewed on the front page of the Seahawk. The very next week he was on the front page of the Seahawk again in yet another interview, but this time it was about SGA offering Legal Services.

It is without further ado I present you with the SGA Person of the Week... Joe Mitchell. You've done a great job!

Congratulations!!!

Pat Kalembe is the latest winner of the free movie ticket give away. He answered correctly the first question of where the Meet Your Senator Night Receptions are held. The answer was the Center Stage Cafe.

Unfortunately, no one answered correctly to the question concerning the Police Chief. I'll give you another hint...

SGA held a reception to welcome the city's new Police Chief. His name is....

Our next question in our movie ticket give away is....

In the SGA Update last week, there were a total of three drawings. One was of a dollar sign and one was of several books. What was the third drawing of?

Again, all members of SGA are excluded and the deadline for submitting your responses is Monday at 12 noon.

Position Open

The position of Parliamentarian has opened and we need you to fill the space. The Parliamentarian advises the Senate on technical matters of procedure set forth by the Senate. Once again the position is open immediately, and those who are interested in working with SGA need to come by the SGA office in Room 200 in the University Union and fill out an application.

The Ball Is In Our Court

I looked at the dirty orange basketball that lay hidden under my pile of books, clothes, and pizza boxes. It wasn't much to behold. The black grip grooves had all but disappeared. The leather was peeling off in some places. Its bounce wasn't always true either, a combination of muffed inflation attempts and days left outside in temperatures below freezing. It didn't matter, it was allowed its imperfections, it was special.

Why?

Because it contained a certain scrawled, machine copied signature of a famous National Basketball Association star (NBA), Earvin "Magic" Johnson.

I grew up with this semi-legend and he with me. I watched him take his Michigan Spartan teammates to the NCAA Championships in '79. I sympathized with his disappointment of missing the '80 Olympics because of the boycott. I cheered each time he took the L.A. Lakers to the NBA Championships.

Last Friday, I saw him at his best, facing an uncertain future against a terrible virus, and doing it with the same big toothy grin that we are all accustomed to seeing from him both on and off the basketball court. His smile always seems to say, "It's o.k., everything is going to be all right."

Yes, Magic Johnson has the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), the virus that causes the terminal disease AIDS or acquired immunodeficiency.

Yes, the news is a terrible tragedy to a sports world.

And yes, it is unfair that a great basketball player and gentlemen like Johnson should be dealt such an outcome. It seems almost disrespectful.

But, that's not what you or I should be upset about. What we should be shouting at the top of our lungs is the question, "Why?"

Why do we suddenly take notice of the disease when it hits a sports celebrity like Johnson? Why suddenly do we forget our laughter, our finger-pointing, our see-me attitudes that we hold every time the discussion of AIDS comes up?

Shouldn't we have been as upset and enraged when Rock Hudson and Liberace died of this cruel debilitating disease? Shouldn't we have dug sooner in our pocket for funds to care for AIDS babies that lie in intensive care, gasping for every breath of life? Why did we wait so long?

Perhaps, because we believed like millions of others that it was a homosexual or drug user problem. Others believed that AIDS was a punishment for sinful promiscuity.

The "You get what you deserve" belief was prevalent in our society. Admit it, we knew the risks of sex. We chose to ignore them.

Folks, this is serious stuff. Some of us knew this already. The virus has already touched our lives through a family member, a work colleague, or a friend. We've seen what this disease can do to a loved one's body.

It isn't a pretty sight. We learned to fear AIDS and protect ourselves from its grasp. Now, finally with Johnson's confession, maybe its time the rest of the world took notice and listened. I mean really listen this time.

You can get AIDS if you are straight. You can get it, if you are a male or female, black or white, tall or short, a drug user or not, or rich or poor. You can acquire the disease through blood to blood contact or an exchange of bodily fluids, as in sexual intercourse. Sharing a needle, not wearing a condom, or being too rough and tearing skin during sex puts partners at risks to contract the virus. It is important to know your lover's history.

Now having said this, AIDS is not an easy disease to catch. You can't get it from touching, kissing, or holding a person with the virus. You can't get it from a bathroom seat, swimming pool, telephone booth, or a glass he or she touches. You can't even get it from a sneeze. You may contract a cold though.

Hey! These people are not dead. They are very much alive. They have the same desires and wants you do. They are not freaks or hideous creatures. It's time we all listened and distilled all the rumors.

We in the media have been especially guilty of this AIDS ignorance. We're constantly killing people off before their time.

I've personally read eight stories paying tribute to the Lakers' legend. The stories said how much Johnson would be missed, the contributions he has made to the league and the sport, and all the great games he's played.

All the articles are fine praises to an athlete who has had an exceptional career. I, however, will not bury Johnson prematurely. He has said he will fight the virus and beat it. I believe him.

I believe him and the countless others kicking, scrapping, refusing to yield to this virus. I pray someday that there will be a cure found. Until then, I think one of Johnson's friends, has the right attitude.

Maybe God decided he needed to teach his people about this virus and he chose someone he thought people might listen to. Maybe so. Although Johnson may not be a world leader, he is well-known figure world-wide, and he does have that warm smile. Maybe people will listen to him and take protective action against this virus.

With a name like "Magic" anything is possible.

The L.A. Lakers defeated the Boston Celtics today, 128-115, to record their eighth straight win in the month of November in their '91 season. The Lakers went on to win 25 more games, in an incredible string of 33 consecutive victories. A NBA mark that still stands today.

Seahawks Split Weekend Meets

BY JIM CLARK

The Seahawk swimming and diving teams have announced their presence to the rest of the Colonial Athletic Association.

UNCW dominated their William and Mary foes in a record setting fashion Friday night at the Seahawk natatorium. Two first-year women set school marks as the Lady Seahawks defeated William and Mary, 138-105 for the first time. The men's squad won every event in its 174.5-68.5 victory over the Tribe.

Karin Zick was "surprised" that she had set the varsity record in the 1000 meter freestyle with a time of 10:40.23. "I was excited to swim at home," she said after setting her personal best. Zick also won the 500-meter freestyle with a 5:16.61 time.

Stephanie Plifka raced to school-best 2:08.97 in the 200-meter butterfly. "We've (the team) been putting in a lot of hours, working hard and it is paying off," she said. Plifka captured the 200-freestyle event, doing it in the school's fourth best time recorded.

"I'm extremely pleased with both teams efforts," swim coach Dave Allen said. "It was the women's first win ever over William and Mary, a team that finished third in the conference last year and returned with most of its swimmers."

The men were led by Robert Dermer, Brad Kinkema, Tim White, and Tyson Philway in their victory over the Tribe. The Seahawks averaged a loss last season with the win.

Dermer (200 and 500-meter freestyle), Kinkema (50 free and 200 breaststroke), White (100 free and Freshman swimmer Stephanie Plifka shatters the school record in the 200-meter butterfly by more than a second. Plifka won the event and helped the Lady Seahawks defeat CAA rival William and Mary Friday for the first time.

200 individual medley) and Burke (1 and 3 meter diving) won two events each and Tyson Philway won his second consecutive dual meet, the 200 backstroke event.

The sweep on Friday raised both the men's and women's records to 2-0 in the conference.

On Sunday the teams travel to N.C. State and Freshman John Spann hooks in two of his 16 for the Seahawks in their exciting 89-87 win over the Kentucky Sports Crusaders. Fish led UNCW with 21, including the winning free-throws with five seconds remaining.

UNCW Loses In Tourney

BY DAVID BARNHARDT
Staff Writer

The UNCW men's soccer team ended its '91 season last Thursday, with a 6-1 loss in the Colonial Athletic Conference (CAA) tournament to Old Dominion University in Norfolk, Va.

The ninth-ranked Monarchs, playing on their home field, won the second year tournament defeating both Richmond (semis) and James Madison (finals) by identical 1-0 marks. The win gives ODU the automatic bid to the NCAA tournament.

The Seahawks were heavy underdogs going into the contest, but hoped to be competitive. However, a slow start and an unrelenting Monarch attack stomped out any ideas of an upset.

Old Dominion struck early and often. The Monarchs scored three goals in 14 minutes. The first occurring 19 minutes into the game on a Marcelo Esababla blast. Less than five minutes later, the score jumped to 2-0, as the tandem passing of Tony Blunt and Patrick Coates netted another Monarch score. Geoff Thompson finished off the onslaught nailing goal number three in the upper right corner of the Seahawk net.

"We had a good game plan and we Seahawks netted a late goal as forward Mehmet Kocur connected.

UNCW finishes the season with the same record as they did in '90, a 6-8-1 overall mark and a 2-6-0 record in the CAA. UNCW hurt themselves late in the season dropping three of their last four games.

"With the exception of the two losses in Charleston, I think we played as well as we could with this team," Blackmore said. "We also had good wins over American and Campbell, so there were high and low moments this season."

UNCW has struggled offensively this year. The final Seahawk tallies show the team being outshot by opponents by 65 goals (217-152). The missed scoring opportunities showed on the scoreboard where UNCW was outscored 29-21.

Greg Diamond was the team's most prolific scorer with 12 points on five goals and two assists.

The Seahawk defense fared better limiting opponents to two goals a contest.

Senior goalkeeper Tom Redmond posted 1.8 goals against the average while starting all 15 games for the Seahawks. He finished his career with 92 saves: placing him number four on the UNCW all-time list.

Clark's Picks
Redskins Will Push
Their Mark To 11-0

Last Sunday I checked the skies for the second coming because both the Colts and Bucs won. I was disappointed that I didn't see the wins coming, but I don't think anybody else saw them either.

Though I'm not a 'Skins fan, I loved seeing them stomp the Falcons. The reason the Falcons: over celebrate when they score; and win it happens more in their talk than on the field.

CHICAGO AT INDY: The Bears can't afford anymore losses if they want a home playoff game. Bears 27-10.

CINCINNATI AT PHILLY: The Eagles will complete their sweep of Ohio. After last week's comeback, the Eagles are for real. Eagles 24-16.

DALLAS AT N.Y. GIANTS: Only one game separates these rivals in the NFC East standings. The Cowboys won the first meeting, but I think the Giants will pull this one out. 21-17.

DENVER AT KANSAS CITY: This is a "pick'em" game. The AFC West lead is at stake and the Raiders are breathing down their necks. Kansas City 23-20.

L.A. RAMS AT DETROIT: The Lions are tough at home but Jim Everett is due for a big game. Rams 35-21.

MINNESOTA AT GREEN BAY: Years ago I would have picked the Vikings, but since they moved indoors they've lost that cold magic. Green Bay 24-14.

NEW ORLEANS AT SAN DIEGO: Once again, I'm tempted to pick the Chargers, but the Saints are too tough defensively. The Saints still have a chance for best record in the NFC. Saints 17-9.

N.Y. JETS AT NEW ENGLAND: The Patriots are a season away from respectability, and at home they are very tough. Hugh Millen will have a big game. Pats 27-14.

PHOENIX AT SAN FRANCISCO: Without Montana and Young the Niners have struggled and Phoenix isn't much better. I'll go with the Niners defense 17-6.

SEATTLE AT L.A. RAIDERS: The Raiders seem to find a way to win and need one this week to stay in the play-off picture. Raiders 17-14.

TAMPA BAY AT ATLANTA: I can't go against the Falcons at home. These "Too Legit To Quit" guys didn't sing last week, but they'll have the whole choir going Sunday. Falcons 31-10.

WASHINGTON AT PITTSBURGH: Could this be the week the 'Skins took too far ahead and don't take their game seriously? Could this be the first blemish? Nah. Skins 28-10.

CLEVELAND AT HOUSTON: The "Run and Shoot" will explode and put the final nail in the Browns' play-off hopes. Look for Warren Moon to throw for over 300. Oilers 42-16.

BUFFALO AT MIAMI: The Dolphins have a habit of playing big on Monday night (remember the Bears game in '85). They'll do it again and shock the Bills. 35-27.

The Soviets Invade

BY JIM CLARK
Staff Writer

The women kicked off the 1991-92 basketball season with a tough home loss to Elektrasila, a touring Soviet national team, 93-78 in an exhibition game Tuesday night.

Coch Scott Tynes was happy to get the season underway. "It was great to finally play somebody. Now we know what we need to work on," she said.

The Soviet team featured six players six feet or taller, but only one rebounded the Seahawks by four, 61-57. "We did an excellent job boxing out and rebounding," Tynes said. "We just didn't capitalize on our chances."

Leading the way for the Seahawks was sophomore Zandra Harris. She finished with twenty-eight points, six rebounds, and three assists. "We knew they were big and quick, but we showed them we could play with them in the second half," Harris said.

Despite the loss, Tynes was optimistic. "We got some good play out of our freshmen and (the team) played all-out, scrappy ball for forty minutes," she said. "We made our free throws tonight and that will have to continue if we are to be competitive." The team hit twenty-eight of forty-two free throws overall, including thirteen of seventeen in the second half.

Freshmen Hannah Grady, Myra Horton, and Joanna Chandler each contributed in their Seahawk debuts.

Grady had seven rebounds and hustled for every loose ball. After the game she went for stitches to repair a cut lip she received diving for a loose ball in the first half. Horton had thirteen points and five rebounds. Chandler had four points and five rebounds. Sophomore Lorraine Cordaway added sixteen points and twelve rebounds for the Seahawks.

Next up for the women are UNC-Asheville on Nov. 23 and Duke on Nov. 27 on the road. The next home game is Tuesday, Dec. 3 against Wake Forest at 7 p.m. at Trask Coliseum.

Election Held To Choose V.P.

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

Special elections are being held today to replace outgoing Student Government Association Vice President Kelli Shafer. The elections are being held from 10 a.m. to 7 p.m. in the University Center. The candidates running for the vacant office are Steve Sappe and Barry Graham.

The special election is the result of an amendment made to the constitution to clarify a contradiction about the office. At the November 11 senate meeting, it was decided that the vice presidency would be an elected position and there would be no succession into the office. Shafer, who resigned to study abroad, vacated the office effective December 2.

The SGA senate spent three weeks considering the amendment and Graham said, "The system was used. They have the right to vote whether for me or my opponent."

Graham said that he is not worried about apathetic voters. "It [Voting] is their right, whether they choose to or not. No one can make you participate. If they don't know the candidates, they won't vote."

Graham said, "The race is not about politics. It's about student rights. I want to represent the students. I'll let you know where I stand on issues. Someone that doesn't isn't worth having."

If Graham is elected, he is not worried about the transition that the senate might experience in adapting to a new vice president. "They can handle it. I have full confidence in the Senate."

There are senators that agree with Graham. "It might be a hard transition, but with this group, I think it will be a successful one," Senator Chris Peer said. Shafer said, "Everything is in order. Either of the candidates will step in and take the senate through March. I think the transition will be easy."

Graham said if he wins, the status quo within the senate will be maintained. "I anticipate no problems. I will make changes that Kelli [Shafer] implemented. I have been satisfied with her work. I'm satisfied with leaving it just the way it is. I think I can do just as good of a job. There should be no comparisons between us. I have totally different views."

Shafer said, "The new vice president will do a good job. The people running will carry on things that I started."

Because Sappe, a graduate student, is not on the SGA this semester that could affect his race, Graham said, "The senate is probably more ready to accept me. The new senators don't know him. They're not used to him. They are more apt to accept me. It's only natural," he added.

As of press time Sappe was unavailable for comment.

Graham said, "Kelli did a damn good job. I am proud of her and I will miss her."

Graham is not the only one that will miss Shafer. "She has done a terrific job. She has been the cohesive course that has held SGA through difficult times," Senator Ashley Wallace said.

"I will miss her. She has done a terrific job," said Senator Chris Peer.

Senator Victor Brown said, "I will miss her because she played a big part. It was my first time in SGA and she helped me and encouraged me. She brought all of us in, old and new."

Student Body President Curtis Wilson said, while presenting a plaque to Shafer during the last senate meeting, "It has been a good year. Kelli has done an excellent job. I'm sorry to see her go. I will miss her effort and motivation."

Shafer said that she will miss her job when she is studying Islamic history in Malta. "It has been great and wonderful. I enjoyed working with all the officers and senators. I will keep in touch."

Winter Commencement Held

Ex-Governor Speaks To Graduates

From UNCW News

The University Of North Carolina at Wilmington will award 692 degrees at its 43rd commencement exercises at 10 a.m., Saturday, December 7 in Trask Coliseum. Presenting the commencement address will be the honorable James E. Holzhouser, Jr., former governor of the State of North Carolina.

This is the first December commencement ever held at UNCW, a development necessitated by an increasing number of students graduating during summer and fall semesters. Having a December ceremony for summer and fall graduates allows students to invite an unlimited number of guests to attend the ceremony. The past two spring commencements, a guest ticketing system had to be implemented due to space limitations in Trask Coliseum.

In this graduating class, some 641 will receive bachelor's degrees while 51 will be awarded graduate degrees. Those graduating in December will include 191 bachelor's candidates and 21 graduate students who graduated during the summer and 450 undergraduate and 30 graduate students who finish at the end of fall semester 91.

Holzhouser, who served as governor of North Carolina from 1973-77, is now a member of the Board of Governors of the University of North Carolina and is presently serving his second elected eight-year term. He will be presented the Honorary Doctor of Laws during the ceremony.

During his term as governor, Holzhouser was elected to the Executive Committee of the National Governors Conference, and he was elected chair of the Southern Regional Education Board, co-chair of the Coastal Plains Regional Commission, and chair of the Southern Growth Policies Board.

A native of Watauga County, Holzhouser graduated from Davidson College and the University of North Carolina School of Law. He is now a practicing attorney in Pinehurst.

Also participating in the commencement ceremonies will be Samuel H. Poole, who chairs the UNC Board of Governors; Dr. Raymond H. Dawson, senior vice president for academic affairs of UNC General Administration; Robert F. Warwick, chair of the UNCW Board of Trustees; and Christy Gunnell, senior class president.

James Holzhouser is the keynote speaker at UNCW's 43rd Commencement Exercise held 10 a.m. Saturday in Trask.

Human Rights Chapter Forms

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor in Chief

A chapter of the human rights organization Amnesty International is forming at UNCW.

Erin Anderson, the chapter's organizer, says she hopes to raise interest in the organization on Dec. 10, which is Human Rights Day and marks Amnesty International's 30th anniversary. Information about the organization and the UNCW chapter is scheduled to be displayed in the University Union and the University Center.

Amnesty International is an organization which encourages adherence to its Declaration of Human Rights, which forbids imprisonment or torture because of reasons including political beliefs and race. The organization also protests the use of "cruel and unusual punishment" including capital punishment.

Organization members try to help these "prisoners of conscience" by writing letters to the governments of countries where the prisoners are held. According to Anderson, these letters are often the first indication to these governments that the rest of the world is aware of their practices.

Amnesty International officials say that the letters really work in releasing prisoners or at least improving their living conditions. "Thousands of prisoners have been released through Amnesty International's work," Anderson said.

The purpose of the UNCW chapter is to "get as many letters out as we can" and to raise student awareness, Anderson said. "Awareness is the key factor" in the success of a group like Amnesty International, she said.

The chapter will also participate in the Urgent Action network, which writes letters and telegrams to try to save prisoners of conscience who are in immediate danger of execution or other bodily harm.

Anderson said she is also planning for the chapter to sponsor letter writing workshops and campus events including the Awareness Festival, a one-day event featuring live music and information tables from various political, environmental, and other groups.

Previous Awareness Festivals have been put on by the Campus Awareness Organization (CAO), which is sponsoring the new Amnesty International chapter. Anderson said that the CAO paid the $100 annual dues required to found a college chapter of Amnesty International. She also said that the chapter will be the main focus of CAO activities in the future.

Amnesty International is not affiliated with any political group or party, and Anderson said she wants the UNCW chapter to run the same way. She said she will not even create positions of power in the chapter like president or vice president.

Anderson has been an individual member of Amnesty International for three years. She is also involved with Habitat for Humanity, Greenpeace, and the "Nurturing Program" in the New Hanover county schools which tutors kids who are in danger of dropping out of school.

Health Services Moves

Student Help Centers Moving

BY JENNIFER WILSON
Staff Writer

The Student Health and Wellness Center, the Student Development Center and LivWell are moving.

These three services will move into the old cafeteria building between Kenan and King Halls. The cafeteria has been under renovation and remodeling for a year and will open as Westside Hall in about two weeks.

The extra space in the new building will provide the Student Health and Wellness Center with a pharmacy and a larger office.

A resource room with videos and computers will also be set up in the new building. Plans are also underway to begin selling non-prescription drugs, and first-aid items like crutches and Ace Bandages that students now have to purchase off-campus.

Deborah Haywood, assistant director for Health Promotion (LivWell), says she is excited about the move for several reasons.

"We've been sharing space with Alternatives! for four years," she said. "We're two very different programs and we've been bursting at the seams. The extra space will be great."

The new facility will allow LivWell to have a resource area where students can drop in, weigh themselves and check their blood pressure. An extensive resource library will also be available. Students can use this for writing papers, giving speeches or for their own information.

Nutritional assessments have been provided by LivWell for some time, but beginning in January, the process will be streamlined. Instead of waiting for their three day food diary to be analyzed, a student will now be able to drop off the diaries and a LivWell assistant will process them and send them back to campus mail boxes within a week.

Additional space will also enable LivWell to show health programs about cardiovascular and nutritional fitness. These will be aired for an hour a week for three weeks.

There also may be work opportunities available for students such as LivWell assistants, internships and practicums. Volunteers will be welcomed as well. Those interested need to contact Deborah Haywood at 395-3683 or at LivWell's present location at University Union room 104.

Westside Hall will also provide more space for the Student Development Center, which provides confidential individual and group counseling for personal, social, career or educational concerns. Decision-making resources for careers and college majors include a computer guidance system, aptitude and interest testing, and an information library.

Students can still visit LivWell at its present location in the Union. Students can visit the Student Development Center and the Student Health and Wellness Center, both presently located in the Barney Support Center.

ALTERNATIVES!

Pass the word... Alternatives! has a vacancy in its Peer Education program for the Spring Semester. Any interested student may apply for this ten hour per week paid position by coming by the office in room 104 of the University Union and picking up an application packet or calling 395-3683. Monday Dec. 9 at 5 p.m. is the deadline to turn in applications.

UNIVERSITY UNION

As a service to the student body during exams, the University Union has extended its hours from Saturday, December 7 to Monday, December 16. The Union will now be open Monday-Friday 7 a.m. to Midnight and Noon to Midnight on Saturday and Sunday. The Union has some excellent areas for studying and invites students to come by and take advantage of them.

The University Union and University Center Employees of the Month for November are Cathy Bryson and Mary Faison.

SHARING THE CHALLENGE

World AIDS Day, December 1, 1991

National AIDS Awareness Day,
December 2, 1991

During the past decade, HIV has infected at least eight to ten million people worldwide. Today, and each day, the pandemic continues to grow, as an additional 5,000 people will become infected by the virus. By the year 2000, the World Health Organization (WHO) projects that between 30 and 40 million men, women and children will be infected with HIV and we will have reached a cumulative total of between 10 and 15 million AIDS cases.

The spread of AIDS has shown us that it is impossible to live in isolation from the world community—we are part of one planet, one system. We must understand that disease, epidemics, and pollution do not need passports or visas; they know no boundaries. The health of our nation is inseparably tied to the health of people throughout the planet and we must join together in "Sharing the Challenge."

New Bookstore Service Offered

BY JENNY NEAL
Staff Writer

Students are being offered an alternative to selling books to the University Bookstore. The Student Government Association is opening a consignment bookstore.

The SGA consignment bookstore will be located in University Union room 103. The store will be staffed by 25 students who will be university employees.

In order to use the services of the store, students must bring their used books to the consignment store on December 9 - 13 and December 16 between 9 a.m. and 4 p.m. The books will be sold to the students on January 13 - 17 and January 20 at the same hours in the study room of the Union.

A file will be created that will include the student's name, identification number, university post office box number, and telephone number. This information will be in the book as well. Also in the student's file will be information about the book including the title, course for which it has been used and the student's asking price for the book.

The student will be given a voucher form in case the book is not sold and they want it back. If the book is sold on the sale dates, a check will be mailed to the student's on-campus mail box. If the book is not sold, it can be picked up on January 21-22. Books that are not claimed will become the property of SGA.

"It is not the goal of the SGA consignment bookstore to compete with the University Bookstore, but rather to give the students an opportunity to get more money for their used books. Also, students can buy books for less through the SGA consignment bookstore," Joe Mitchell, student services coordinator said.

Christy Gunnell, senior class president and chair-person of the ad-hoc SGA consignment bookstore committee, using the University Bookstore as an example, said that a book could be bought there at $30 and sold back at $55. The SGA consignment store will let the student set the price. "If a student sells a book through our store at $30 that book will sell for $30 to the students. The seller will get his or her asking price. This will allow students to set the price of their used books."

Mitchell added, "Our computer system flags the books which aren't being used next semester so students will have the option to take their used books to the University Bookstore and sell it back to the company if another school is using the book."

Gunnell and Mitchell both agreed that the success of the SGA consignment bookstore is dependent upon student response. When students use the consignment store, $1.00 will be added to the cost of the book. This helps pay for the expense of the bookstore and to pay employees.

Through the anticipated student response, the store will achieve longevity. This longevity "will allow the consignment store to continue from semester to semester," Mitchell said.

Christy Gunnell said Li-Shing Wang, Student Life Studies Director, set up the computer system that will be used for the consignment bookstore; Dick Scott, vice chancellor for business affairs, assisted the committee with the implementation of the program; Cathy Birmingham, SGA liaison, helped define roles that those in SGA could play in the bookstore's creation. Additionally, Suzie Goodrum, SGA office manager, helped in all aspects of planning, initiating and implementing the program.

As well as help from faculty and staff, Gunnell received help from the Bookstore Committee consisting of Sean Williams, Ivy Chalmers, Lyn Carney, Roger Hyman, Ashley Wallace, Krista Habacker and Christine Policastro. "Everyone's assistance has been greatly appreciated," Gunnell said.

UNCW is represented this year in The Festival of Trees by a gold and green Seahawk decorated tree.

"It's about the community that UNCW cares," said SGA Attorney General Lisa Royal.

"Sometimes I think the community thinks we don't care, but we did want to show that we do care and support them," she said.

The Festival of Trees is Hospice's biggest fund raiser of the year, she said. Hospice aids the terminally ill at home instead of at the hospital by helping with medical services.

The UNCW tree has the theme: "The Seahawk Spirit Cares", Royal said. SGA spent $500. This paid for the silk tree, fees, and contributed to Hospice.

Sue Strickler, a clerk in the gift shop at the Hilton, said the 125 trees can be admired from Nov. 30 through Dec. 8, for $5. "It's beautiful, it's absolutely beautiful," she said.

The Hilton, on 301 N. Water St., offers admittance 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. until Dec. 8, she said. UNCW's tree is downstairs in the Gingerbread room.

The bookstore loaned Seahawk paraphernalia to SGA to use to decorate the tree. Royal said, so the only costs were bows and a tree skirt.

About Dec. 9, she said, the tree will be returned to UNCW. SGA will return the ornaments to the bookstore, and the tree will stand in the University Union's living room for students to enjoy. She said the union will provide some ornaments to go with the green and yellow bows.

This has been the first year SGA has given to charities, Royal said, and whether the tree goes back in the festival next year will be decided by next year's senate. If students are looking for a study break in the next few days, you can make a trip to the Hilton, get into the Holiday spirit, and support Hospice at the same time.

"Twas the Night Before Finals"

"Don't worry about exams, you have nothing to fear, 'cause we know you'll be back with us again next year!"

I can hardly hold back the tears. No, I am not still mourning the loss of the Mad Monk, although I do understand that The Embers did a heck of a job there the other night. I think it was some sort of tribute to The Doors ("Come on Baby Light My Fire").

Neither am I distraught about the recent defeat of David Duke in Louisiana. I hear he was considering running for a position in the government of South Africa, but even they are now seeing the error of their ways.

What I am so upset about is the fact that the semester is nearly over, and we all know what that means. This is the week we must ACTUALLY SHOW UP for classes and make up for all of the things we have not been doing all semester. It is time to dig out that lab notebook or writing journal and pick up where you left off (i.e. August). This is truly a week of late nights and early mornings for the college student.

Your entire semester culminates this week. Aside from lab notebooks and journals that are due, professors want to give that last gut-wrenching test (or ten page "quiz") this week. Isn't it enough that we have to worry about finals. FINALS!!!!

Oh no, you haven't even thought about final exams. They are only a few days away. The few days before finals are kinda like when you are sitting in the dentist's office only a few minutes away from having your wisdom teeth yanked out.

I never have understood why they insist on removing your wisdom teeth anyway (or why they insist on giving finals). I simply refused. "I don't got but a little bit of wisdom and you ain't gone take it outta my head," I informed my dentist.

If only I could refuse to take finals and still keep my teeth.

Well, we do have to deal with our final exams next week, and while I can't alleviate any of the pain you will endure, I may be able help get you in the mood for exams. To accomplish this I have composed, for your reading enjoyment Twas the Night Before Finals by Nobel prize winning columnist, Phil Smith.

Twas the night before finals and all through the school, not a creature was stirring, except for one fool (Campus Police officer is checking the moonlit parking lot for illegal parking).

I, in my boxers, had laid down for a nap: I had just finished taking my evening (trip to the bathroom).

When out on the doorstep a great noise arose, that I knew in a moment it must be Dominoes (yes someone had ordered pizza to my address, again).

I sprang from my bed just to make sure, and was quite surprised when I opened the door.

And what to my wondering eyes did appear, but Dr. Leuze and four of his reindeer (actually it was my four professors, but I couldn't make that rhyme).

He whistled and shouted and called them by name. "On Callahan, on Cable, now Sayed and Plyler, this should not take long; this kid is so lame."

They did not say anything or give me a look, but handed me my exams and closed all my books. "You have ten minutes to take these," they all said with a sneer, as I pictured the end of my college career.

But I completed the exams with the greatest of ease, and asked my professors to kindly leave.

And as they left I heard them exclaim, "Don't worry about exams, you have nothing to fear, 'cause we know you'll be back with us again next year!"

Well that's the end of my poem, and my last column for this semester. I hope you've enjoyed all of them. Have a good break and look for me again next semester (I just might have some things to write about!). Until then, keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

It's Time To Take Crime Seriously

At approximately 2 a.m. on Saturday, November 22 at a dance sponsored by Delta Sigma Theta, shots rang out in the midst of a fight in the parking lot of the University Center. That's right—the University Center. There were several people assaulted during the incident, but no one was shot. One person was arrested on charges of simple affray. Three people were treated at New Hanover Regional Medical Center and released. No students were involved.

On August 16 of this year, two women were raped on campus. One of the women was a staff member of Residence Life. The victims were taken to New Hanover Regional Medical Center, with no injuries.

Both of these incidents have had repercussions on campus life. All on-campus dances open to the public have been temporarily suspended. This suspension will last until there is an evaluation of the action and until there is a policy developed by Student Affairs. Because of the rape, canisters of mace have become popular among females that must be out after dark.

But these are not the only incidents of crime on campus. Why else must students lock up their bikes to go into the post office? And why are these bikes locked with kryptonite locks? Most likely, it is because the student wants his or her bike parked where they left it.

If a student is not in their campus residence, it is usually locked up and the windows are shut. But then, if a student is in their residence, it may be locked anyway. Some on-campus residents have valuable like refrigerators, computers, stereos and video cassette recorders that they want to be in the place in which they were left. While some residents are afraid that they will be burglarized, others have different fears. One of these fears is being assaulted in one way or another. As shown by the rape mentioned earlier, it is something that has to be dealt with on campus, especially in co-ed residences.

Students should not have to be concerned with the crimes that have been occurring on campus. Campus Police - and even the Wilmington City Police - are playing a role in the lives of students—whether we like it or not. The atmosphere of uneasiness and fear needs to change. Reality, in the form of an increasing crime rate, has made its way to our campus.

Squeezing A Semester Into 72 Hours

JOURNAL ENTRY
6:58, 493—It's three A.M. and do I know where my notes are? I must have missed that day. I can't find them anywhere.

I eat another spoonful of my third pot of coffee and step out into the backyard to run a few laps before I sit back down to stare at those meaningless pages of literature again. The pages weren't meaningless when I wrote them an hour ago, I don't know what happened. Maybe a gremlin came in while I was doing my laps.

I look at the Ansel Adams calendar hanging on the wall. Man, how does he control his lighting like that? I bet that lake is teeming with trout that have never even dreamed of seeing a hook. Oh yeah, calendar... I see that there are only three dates not yet marked off on this semester. Two more class meetings. In the next 72 hours I will finish half a semester worth of journal entries for two classes, an I-Search paper on which I have yet to do the first interview, a 10-15 page paper for a senior seminar, a collection of poems for a writing class, and a column for the last issue of The Seahawk. Then I get to worry about exams.

How do I find myself in this spot at the end of every semester? I can stay together through the first three quarters of every course—I even got ahead for a while this semester. Then the time warp hits. One day there are three weeks left in the semester and the next day there are only three days. I think heavy eyelids as I contemplate this at 3:10 and perform a miniature version of the same time warp. It... 4:05 when the birds wake.

I slunker down to get serious, strangely rested from that excellent blink. I scrawl something about Alfred Lord Tennyson, Hobbits, and animal rights. One of my words looks strangely like a dragon. It flies off the page and into the kitchen. I follow, planning to fry up another plate of coffee.

Instead of the kitchen, I find myself in the bedroom. Somehow, I have missed a turn. But wait, what's that on the pillow? I move a little closer to see. Maybe a little closer? What is it? I am leaning dangerously off balance now. I feel gravity taking over. Then I feel...

I sit up on the bed, 20 minutes late for my 12:00 class, with a caffeine buzz that makes methamphetamine look like thosazine. I would really like to eat, but my stomach is sealed off like Tut's tomb. I speed out the door heading for the school. Five miles down the road I turn back to get the car.

Finally in my 1:00 class, I try to breathe a sigh of relief. The caffeine is starting to wear off now, and I climb down from the ceiling. Now if I could only get my hair to stop crawling around on my head... What? Homework from last night? We had homework? Uh, the dragon ate it! Time drags like hell when you aren't prepared for class and it looks like the hands of my watch haven't even moved since I got here.

Someone is telling me that I am in their seat. I task askance and realize that a different professor is teaching the class. In fact, the whole class is different. I look at my watch... still 1:00. How strange.

My little faux pas with the watch battery snafu, thence out, I struggle up the stairs to my last class of the day. The caffeine is finally gone now, leaving me a quaking, empty, de-energized husk. My eyes glue thickly and it is hard to distinguish objects. A girl I do not recognize pushes me bodily through a door. Only after she kicks me hard in the shin to get my eyes open do I realize that I had wandered into the women's restroom. I finally crawl into the right room. I shrink into a corner in the back of the class, unable to make the effort that will get me into my seat. The professor breezes by whistling a happy tune. As she passes, she slips a piece of paper into my hand. Quiz.

It's all downhill from here. Right? Phillip Loughlin is a regular columnist for The Seahawk.

LETTERS To The Editor

Dear Editor:

I have recently changed my major from nursing to education. Since I changed my course of study, I have heard a lot of comments from other students about how easy the school of education is and how people who attend it are "copping out."

Hearing these comments makes me think about how wrong some people must perceive what we are doing here.

Our business in the school of education is learning. We learn how to learn. We learn how to teach others to learn. Our professors have all been teachers before. They all know how people learn and how to effectively teach subjects according to this information. Most professors in other schools in the university have never taken an education course. They know the material well but what information do they have on effective ways to get their information across to students? I feel that one of the reasons why we are more successful in the school of education is that we have teachers who know how to be effective.

I have not seen any students as dedicated as my classmates in the school of education. Let's face it, we're not here so we can make money when we get out! We are here because we care about what we are doing.

The work that we do in our classes is different from my work I have done before. I spend lots of time outside the university and in schools. I observe, teach lessons, and then make my own interpretations of what happens. When I'm not out in the schools, I am either in class or working on a project. Contrary to popular belief, this work is NOT easy. It takes lots of time, dedication, and perseverance.

I am not saying that there are not good students or good professors in other places. I am just saying that maybe some of the ideas about the school of education are acquired without much thought.

It's A "Doggone" Funny World

TODAY'S SCIENCE
QUESTION IS: Who is smarter, dogs or trees?

This question is on our minds here at the Research Institute For Looking Out The Window When We Should Be Writing A Column because of the behavior of our staff dogs. We have two dogs on the staff:

—Ernest, our large main dog, who is powered by an 800-horsepower motor controlled by a tiny computer microchip originally designed for use in a Whack-A-Mole game.

—Zippy, our emergency backup dog, who is basically a small, dim-witted toupee with legs.

Both of these dogs perform a number of routine duties here at the Institute. Their most important duty, of course, is barking. They use the emergency conserving Two-Dog Alternating Bark Procedure: a deep BARK from Ernest, followed immediately by a high, irritating yip! from Zippy, followed immediately by another BARK, and so on BARK yip! BARK yip! until morning. They implement this procedure whenever their keen senses detect that one of the following Danger Red Alert situations has occurred:

1. Somebody is at the door.
 2. Nobody is at the door.
 3. Another dog — my dog, anywhere in the universe — is barking.
 4. None of the above.
- Zippy performs two other main duties:

"Zippy has no idea how large these dogs are; all he can see is a snout, which is about his size."

1. Getting sick on lizards. Here in South Florida we have cute little lizards all over the place. You often see them halfway up the wall, holding very still, as if thinking: "How the hell did I get up HERE?"

Zippy spends a large portion of his day relentlessly hunting these lizards down, swallowing them, then barking them back up again in pieces. Here at the Institute we've been trying to explain this behavior, and we now believe that it dates back many eons to when giant lizards roamed the Earth, lumbering through the jungle on huge legs, shaking the ground STOMP STOMP STOMP and making so much noise that they failed to hear the high-pitched yip! from way down on the ground, where Zippy's prehistoric ancestor, the small but fierce Saber-Toothed Toupee, was warning them that they were in his territory. And so the lizards kept coming until STOMP STOMP STOMP Zippy yip! SPIT Zippy's ancestor was converted into a saber-toothed pizza. Millions of years later, Zippy is still ticked off about this.

2. Trying to get killed. Next door, separated from us by a tall wooden fence, is a property with three big German shepherd dogs, all of whom look as though they should be tamed Burt. There is a small crack under the fence, and every day Zippy goes to the crack and barks vicious insults at the Barts, causing them to become furious and take turns thrusting their snouts as far as they can through the crack in an effort to get Zippy. Zippy has no idea how large these dogs are: all he can see is a snout, which is about his size. He is firmly convinced that he can kick the snout's butt, if it would only come out and fight like a man. Every day he gets more insulting, barking remarks about the Barts' mother, driving them into an insane frenzy of rage. We're getting so sick of the noise that we're thinking about throwing Zippy over the fence to see how tough he is when confronted with more than just the nasal secret of an opposing dog. The lizards favor this idea. "Go ahead, toss him over," they whisper, from up on the wall. "He could use the exercise."

Ernest ignores the lizards and the Barts. Ernest's entire existence is focused on one goal: Getting a squirrel. We have a large battalion of squirrels here at the Institute, scampering from tree to tree, and Ernest spends hours racing around beneath them, barking the enticing message that they should please come down so she can eat them. The squirrels never do this, but sometimes they scamper along the top of the fence, which forms a sort of Rapid Transit Squirrel Monorail.

The fence is high enough so that Ernest can't reach the top, but whenever an Express Squirrel comes scampering along, Ernest races alongside, barking furiously, gaining speed, sprinting harder and harder, barking louder, becoming a blur now, faster and faster until BUNK he runs headfirst at approximately 20 miles per hour into a tree that has been located in the same spot for 30 years. We personally have watched Ernest hit this tree THREE TIMES, although that is probably only a small fraction of the actual total.

These impacts have caused so discernible damage to Ernest. We think that automobile manufacturers should stop messing around with safety gimmicks such as air bags, and start making car bumpers out of the material Ernest's head is made from. Whatever it is, it's definitely not brain tissue, because Ernest has yet to make even the slightest effort to avoid the tree.

The tree, on the other hand, is definitely moving away from the fence.

Old Battle Revived For Ratings

In case you missed every media outlet of the country this week, here's the main story you missed, "JAPAN BOMBS PEARL HARBOR!"

Saturday marks the 50th anniversary of that tragic day (unless you believe President Bush's Sep. 7, 1988, campaign speech given to a VFW convention) and every newspaper and news network is doing a feature on the event.

The Wilmington Star-News is detailing the impact of the bombing on the industry of Wilmington. ABC News will show a two-hour special, NBC is running its mini-series "Pearl", and CBS is celebrating the anniversary with a two-hour show.

Why? The main reason is ratings. The second largest organized group in the United States is the American Association of Retired Persons (AARP) and they are a targeted audience. The vast majority of AARP members look upon this as a major event in their lives and, with this being the golden anniversary, will tune in to relive the horror.

The networks are more than happy to dedicate countless hours of research, film, and prime-time viewing hours to this week's news topic because it is not news. The outcome was determined long ago and its pretty safe to assume we lost the battle and won the war.

ABC, in its infinite wisdom, picked Gen. Norman Schwarzkopf to be its military specialist. That move showed that ABC News is only going after the ratings and not trying to educate. Pearl Harbor is a naval base, the Japanese fighters took off from aircraft carriers, and the war in the Pacific was mostly a naval conflict. Therefore, ABC has determined, an army general is the wisest choice to interpret the history of events.

One of the segments I saw high-lighted was about a group of Americans who want the Japanese government to apologize for the surprise Sunday morning attack. This sounds more like something for one of those worthless daytime talk shows.

This was war, which, as I paraphrase Gen. G. S. Patton, means you are supposed to make the other fellow die for his country. Maybe, if this group wanted an apology from the Roosevelt administration for not telling the American people of the attack when it learned of it, I could see one being due.

President Franklin D. Roosevelt knew about the impending attack in advance but did not act because the Pacific fleet was nearly obsolete as a fighting force and the only way Roosevelt could get a new one built, and built quickly, was for his current one to be destroyed. The rally-round-the-flag emotion that swept the nation got the Americans into the war and Roosevelt's fleet and public support (The "rally" theory, using the military to bolster public support, has effectively been used since then by Presidents Reagan and Bush).

What really disturbs me is the attention given to history when there are more important topics worthy of the time. What is the latest in AIDS, sickle-cell anemia, multiple sclerosis, or muscular dystrophy research? What about states that don't inspect food processing plants for safety violations? What about companies that put their workers' lives at risk in order to save a buck? How large is the hole in the ozone layer now? What is Congress doing about the $4 trillion debt? (They must have done something, they are in recess for the rest of the year.)

The newspapers, news networks, and politicians have all contracted a dangerous disease and are spreading it to the rest of America. It's called futuritis. Medically speaking, it's the avoidance of what is frightening if the conditions remain the same, rather than doing the serious, hard work needed to change the possible future for the better.

Oh yeah, one more thing, who were the two big losers in World War II? Who are two of the leading industrial nations in the world today? I'm just glad they decided to invade our country financially instead of militarily. But I don't know which is worse in the end.

Brad Sekulich Old Prejudices Resurface In Yugoslavia

Is this 1991? I was reasonably sure it was until I read a UPI wire service report (12-3-91) concerning Yugoslavia.

Much to my horror I read about how the Serbian dominated Federal Army has ordered all Croats living in the Baranja region of Croatia to leave the area within five days. These Croats will also be required to wear red arm bands which serve to identify their ethnic character.

Sound like a throwback to Nazi Germany? Well, to top it off these Croats are being forced to leave their homes which will then be given to Serbians trucked in for the purpose of "Serbification" of the conquered areas. Of course when this war is over the Serbians will refuse to give up these lands, claiming that it would be inhumane to kick these people out of their homes.

This eerie report also revealed the contents of a report by E.C. monitor ambassador Van Houten to the European Community, which was not intended for publication. This report identifies the Peoples Army of Yugoslavia as the chief obstacle to peace in Croatia. It calls the army's treatment of civilians in Croatia "brutal". It also says the Serbian irregular forces fighting in Croatia are even worse in their treatment of the Croatian civilians. The report describes the federal army as fighting for its very existence and nothing more.

The report continues to detail the unfair nature of the war and concludes with suggested options for ending the war. One of these options calls for armed intervention on the side of the Croats.

The importance of this letter is that it is a further step in showing the rest of the world the brutal nature of the Belgrade communists. The world has been coming around lately, mostly since Dubrovnik and Vukovar have attracted so much attention.

What frustrates me, as a Croatian-American, and so many more like me, is how slow the rest of the world, particularly its leaders, is in responding to Belgrade's wonton destruction. Five months ago we talked of things becoming this bad, but our heritage made our judgement suspect in many peoples' minds. Now, however, we are in the unfortunate position of having been right.

As I've said before the world's democratic leaders must take firm, resolved steps to stop the communist aggression inside Croatia.

George Bush is more than ready to recognize the independence of the Ukraine, but what about Croatia? His continued silence only adds credence to the allegations of this cronies financial involvement with Belgrade.

More and more pictures and horror stories will come out of Croatia as the fighting continues. It is my most sincere hope that someone in an important position will stop saying "too" and start defending democratic ideals over communist aggression. If you share this view, write your senators and congressman and call the White House at 202-456-1111. Tell them to support Croatia in her bid for independence and self determination.

Christmas Is More Than Gifts

BY BOB HAYWOOD
Campus Minister

The end of exams is in sight and we can begin to turn our minds and hearts to Christmas vacation, family, and Christ. Our American way or life makes it a real challenge to find our way to the manger! I want to try to save you some time and frustration by telling you that you can't get to Bethlehem by way of Belk's, Sear's, K-mart, Best, or any other shopping mall. And Mary and Joseph do not like or accept credit cards as a means to worship the Son.

Now, if you are not interested in the events that took place in Bethlehem two thousand years ago, that's fine. Do your own thing. But if you are one who knows at some level inside yourself that something incredible took place in that long ago manger, then I am here to tell you that you are going to have to be intentional in your efforts to make your way to that place which the star in heaven identifies.

There are going to be all kinds of things getting in your way. All of the stuff that's coming to you out of Washington, all the media propaganda about what you need for life to make sense and feel good, all the lists that invite you to spend yourself into oblivion, make it difficult to even get close to Bethlehem.

But something incredible did happen in Bethlehem. Something that does call for worship and praise and adoration. At this particular point in human history, God fashioned himself in human form and lived in our midst and in our condition and called us to a love-oriented life in the full knowledge of the struggle involved in living out that possibility.

So if you have any interest in touching into that reality, then you are going to have to intentionally find the ways to create a holy place in your own heart and mind. Sure, some good stuff can happen at candlelight Christmas Eve services and a nativity scenes, but the real worship comes as we make a space in our life that will allow us to be calm inside ourselves and reflect on the events that we know so well. Picture the manger scene however you can, see yourself there. Don't say anything, don't even pray. Just be there and watch and feel. The child that is there is God's gift to you. What a present! Do you want Him?

Tempus fugit my little pretties. Time is flying away with speed of Zeus. Another semester, and another year (oy vay!) has come to an end (heavy sigh) and now it's time to say good-bye to all our family. See ya real soon, same time, same channel, different year. Why? Because we have to. It's a constant kind of thing. We signed before we knew what we were getting into to, silly fools.

Next semester you can (hopefully) expect an exciting interview with George Lucas by UNCW student and local actor Renn Wilson. Wilson is planning to do several interviews with celebrities visiting the area. Stay tuned.

Hope your holidays are smashing. I'm going to Disneyland with Dave Kendall. Yeah...right!

DISAPPEAR FEAR will play December 13 at Jacob's Run and coming the 14th SOUTHERN CULTURE ON THE SKIDS and 27/28 CAPTAIN COOK & THE COGNIZIT.

It's Beginning To Look A Lot Like Box Office Gold

BY JOHN HARTL
 Seattle Times

It's been a dismal fall for Hollywood, which hasn't come up with a certified blockbuster since "Terminator 2" opened in early July and quickly Schwarzeneggered its way to a $200 million gross.

"The studios are nervous as hell," wrote Anne Thompson in The L.A. Weekly a couple of weeks ago. "Summer's slide in moviegoing continues into the fall," added Susan Spillman in USA Today. "Fear is gripping the movie studios," wrote Kim Masters in the Washington Post. Headlines in Variety and the Hollywood Reporter have suggested a panic state.

But all that changed Nov. 22 with the arrival of two instant hits: Paramount's "The Addams Family" and Disney's "Beauty and the Beast," both of which averaged about $10,000 per theater — although "Addams" opened in many more theaters and ended up with more money in the till.

"Addams" made $24.2 million on 2,411 screens vs. "Beauty's" $9.6 million in 977 theaters.

If nothing else, this disproves the theory that high ticket prices are keeping recession-damaged audiences away from theaters. It's the movies themselves that have been the problem ever since August. If the want-to-see factor is high, cost is no object, and the movie business truly is recession-proof.

At the same time, the news was not so hot for Universal Pictures and producer Steven Spielberg, who are responsible for both Martin Scorsese's brutal remake of "Cape Fear" and the G-rated animated sequel, "An American Tail: Fievel Goes West."

The Scorsese film opened strongly Nov. 13, so Universal expanded the run to 500 more theaters one week later. But the picture earned about the same as it did the first weekend — $10 million — which means that on a per-theater basis attendance dropped significantly. "Cape Fear" will soon be facing a lot of stiff Christmas competition, and may be gone from most theaters by mid-January.

The "American Tail" sequel was a flat-out flop, earning only $3.4 million during its Nov. 22 debut weekend, although business undoubtedly increased last weekend. This is a common pattern for animated features that open before Thanksgiving and usually find their audience at holiday matinees. And once the kids have seen "Beauty and the Beast," they'll be in the mood for another quality cartoon.

The only word-of-mouth hit of the fall, John Hughes' "Curly Sue," continued on its modest way, earning $2.4 million last weekend, for a total of $25.8 million. That's pennies compared to what Hughes' "Home Alone" earned, but it's the only success he's had in four tries since that film opened a year ago.

It's too early to tell what will happen with the other Thanksgiving movies, especially "For the Boys," which opened well on two screens the weekend before last and went into wider release Wednesday, and "My Girl," the Macaulay Culkin tearjerker that opened everywhere Wednesday.

But neither seems likely to have the immediate impact of "Addams," which should hold on and do well throughout the holidays (nobody thinks it's wonderful, but nobody's terribly disappointed either) or "Beauty," which is the only true critical-commercial hit of the season and seems quite likely to become the highest-grossing animated feature ever released.

Will the box-office bells continue to ring next month with the arrival of "Hook," "Star Trek VI" and "JFK"?

Once the movie business is on a roll like this, it's hard to stop. A few popular movies get audiences going back to the multiplexes, where the spillover from a sold-out hit can boost attendance for a picture that's not doing so well. It's a very good time to have any movie in release.

Scorsese's Cape Fear Doesn't Flow As Well As Original

BY ZACHARY BISACKY
 Staff Writer

If you've seen Martin Scorsese's previous films, such as TAXI DRIVER, MEAN STREETS or GOOD FELLAS, then you might be somewhat disappointed with his latest release, CAPE FEAR. In past productions, this compelling director possessed a realistic awareness that had audiences horrified and started at his murky conceptions of life. This film, on the other hand, is simply a commercial disaster which lacks the truth and persuasion he is capable of.

The reason for this unexpected disappointment can be attributed to it being Scorsese's first thriller and first remake. The original CAPE FEAR was made in 1962, in which Robert Mitchum played Max Cady, the ex-con who took revenge on a lawyer (Gregory Peck) by scaring his wife and daughter.

These fundamental characteristics of the original film are all Scorsese has left unchanged in his version: the rest is loaded with moral ambiguities, ideas about guilt and redemption, and a portrayal of a sleazy villain as an educator of retribution. Indeed such themes can be traced back to Scorsese's previous works that were able to produce a gripping effect on the audience, however, they are not intended for this essentially conservative and reactionary film.

In Scorsese's version, Cady (Robert DeNiro), now out of prison, wants revenge on his lawyer, Sam Bowden (Nick Nolte), for suppressing evidence that could have led to his acquittal 14 years ago. While in prison, Cady studied the bible and law books and now feels that Bowden, living the good life with his wife, Leigh (Jessica Lange) and 15-year-old daughter, Danny (Juliette Lewis), needs to be taught a lesson.

The Bowdens aren't exactly a model family, though. Sam's philandering has almost ruined his marriage, and their daughter is a sexually curious pothead. The family's corrupt lifestyle and emotional tensions are actualized through Cady, whose mission is to show them that suffering is good for the soul. Unfortunately, it's this use of Christian subtext that distances us emotionally from the story.

To make moral sense of the film is nearly impossible with its undefined roles. What's more, we're not able to identify with the family's often uncontrollable anger and disgust towards Cady. Despite the ingenious editing and exhilarating intensity among the violent scenes (which are enough to appall even the most undaunted souls), CAPE FEAR is too convoluted and incoherent with its frigid psychology.

Scorsese's ideas of moral purity in this nerve-twisting thriller make it a dishonest and uninteresting representation of the original. In the case of this uninspiring remake, complexity doesn't always override the muscle of simplicity.

And Now Something Totally New: Jeff Nelson Reviews A Resaurant

BY JEFF NELSON
 Staff Writer

Sapone's? Yes, you got the name right. Joe and Viva Sapone, owners of Sapone's Pizzeria located in the Galleria shopping center off Wrightsville Avenue, opened up their Italian restaurant just two months ago. You might not be familiar with the name, since the red sign above the restaurant simply says, "PIZZA", but don't be fooled by the sign: Pizza may be their specialty, but by no means the only culinary delight worth trying by these two transplanted New Yorkers.

You might have guessed by now that Joe's last name was originally Capone. This is not to say that Joe's grandfather, who is responsible for the name change was related to the infamous gangster, Al Capone. It's just that he was worried other people might make that unenviable connection. And yet, Sapone's Italian cuisine definitely owes its unique flavor to family recipes handed down through the generations.

What makes Sapone's pizza different from the countless multitude of other pizza shops? For one thing the dough is made fresh every day. Joe measures all the dough ingredients by eye, something he learned from a cousin and has never forgotten. In Joe's own words, "The dough is the prime secret to a good pizza."

After eating a slice, I'd have to say that coupled with the unusual array of garlic, basil, oregano, and fresh toppings, Sapone's pizza is more than good, it's delicious.

Not to be outdone by the commonplace pizza shop, Sapone's specializes in a variety of pies. Any aficionado of pizza would be more than pleased to find that besides the traditional New York style pizza (round with thin crust), they also offer Sicilian (rectangular with thick crust); the House Special (you'll have to find out for yourself how good this one is), and a white and broccoli pizza (no red sauce, simply cheese, spices, and toppings of your choice). A variety of sizes is also offered, from the 4, 6, and 8 cuts of Traditional, to the 12 and 24 cuts of the Sicilian. Prices range from $3.95 for a 4-cut cheese to $15.95 for a huge, 24-cut Sicilian, which is fairly inexpensive for good food.

Located in the Galleria off of Wrightsville Ave., between Plaza East and the Oleander/Archie road intersection, Sapone's is convenient to the beach as well as the university crowd. But just in case you don't feel like dining out, Sapone's delivers to the greater Wilmington area -- yes, that includes campus too.

So if you have a hankering for pizza, calzones, pasta dinners, deli sandwiches, subs, or Italian dishes like Chicken and veal parmigiana, give Sapone's a call at 256-0007, or simply bring your friends and enjoy a few $3.00 pitchers of beer and some out-of-the-ordinary Italian cuisine.

Sales Suggests Ear Plugs For Tin Machine

BY GARY GRAFF
 Knight-Ridder Newspapers

Soupy Sales knows the proper way to prepare for his sons' performances.

"I already bought my ear plugs," the comedian says the day before Hunt and Tony Sales bring their latest band, Tin Machine, to New York, where Sales now lives.

Following in their dad's show biz footsteps, drummer Hunt, 37, and bassist Tony, 40, have become rock's most highly regarded sibling rhythm section. Coming to prominence first with Todd Rundgren and then with Iggy Pop, the brothers now comprise half of Tin Machine along with David Bowie and guitarist Reeves Gabrels.

"People seem to, on some level, expect us (to be) awestruck being in the same band as David," Hunt Sales says, "but I grew up with my dad and Sammy Davis Jr. and all these famous people at my house. After that, you know that people are people when you get to a certain level."

For the Sales boys, much of that celebrity exposure came in Detroit, where the family lived from 1953 to '60. Tony was born in Cleveland, but Hunt was born at Mt. Carmel Hospital and still refers to Detroit as his home, though he resides in California.

Hunt Sales says both still have fond memories of their time in Detroit. "I remember being around different kinds of people — black people, white people — and being brought up accepting people no matter what color they were...

The younger Sales says he's kept in touch with a few people in Detroit but hasn't been back since he toured with Iggy Pop during the late '70s.

Father Soupy, meanwhile, continues to be proud of his sons — even if he needs ear plugs to see them play.

"It was like that when they started, too," Soupy says. "The cops were at our house every 15 minutes because the music was so loud."

But he says he does like Tin Machine. "I think this new album is much better than the one before, and I'm glad Hunt's singing on it, too. And David Bowie and I have the same birthday — he calls me Mr. S. and I call him Mr. Z."

"Quote Of The Week"

"I think it would be a real boring community if all of us sat around and made wonderful little films like DRIVING MISS DAISY, THE COMMITMENTS, and BOYS n THE HOOD. Now, those are terrific films, but if every studio only made films like that, there would be a tremendous craving for T2 or Batman 5."

The always pun-tificating wardrobe warden Mr. Blackwell dished up a tart Top 10 list Tuesday, zinging the worst-dressed women of the past three decades — which just happens to be the subject of a new book due out next month, "Mr. Blackwell's Worst: 30 Years of Fashion Fiascos." First in line for a Blackwellian dressing down is Cher: "From toes to nose, she's the tacky tawd' terror of the 20th century. A Bono-fide fashion fiasco of the legendary kind." The rest of the worst of the fashion offenders, in order:

—Roseanne Arnold: "an over-the-hill bowling ball in search of an alley."

—Elizabeth Taylor: "The Cleopatra of Camp in schizophrenic fashions Taylor-made for the Titanic. Today she looks great as Mrs. Fortensky ... but for the past 30 years she's been a reject from Minsky's."

—Queen Elizabeth: "God may save the queen — but that prehistoric wardrobe is fit for the Tower."

—Barbra Streisand: "From Brooklyn to Broadway to Beverly Hills, this schmaltzy Secondhand Rose is simply an evergreen atrocity."

—Shelley Winters: "Stuffed in a wacky wardrobe that's more madness than method, Shelley's a colorblind gypsy who's definitely lost her fashion fortune."

—Dolly Parton: "The Queen of Cleavage is a country-western catastrophe. Looks like the Smoky Mountains — in sequins."

—Mia Farrow: "Mama Mia. Farrow dresses like a suicidal sparrow in a depressing cyclone of bargain basement bombs."

—Jayne Mansfield and Madonna (tie): "the patron saints of peroxide and pretense are two peas in a petrifying pod."

—Sinead O'Connor: "A monastic monstrosity ... a creepy cross between Joan of Arc and Kojak."

So help us, try as we might to go on about our lives, Donald Trump just keeps popping up. The latest is that The Donald and ex-fiancee Maria Maples are back on more than speaking terms.

Come Sunday, however, Trump had breakfast with his ex-wife, Ivana. No explanation was forthcoming from Trump's publicists, but somehow we can't shake the sinking feeling that one will be.

QUOTE-UNQUOTE:

—"Incidentally, I too had lunch in the White House solarium, where the Sinatra thing was supposed to have taken place, and believe me, that's not a venue for hanky-panky, if I had any notion in that direction, which I did not."

—"Cher and I knew that it was never going to work out, but she said it first." —rocker Richie Sambora of Bon Jovi, on his former flame, in US magazine.

—"There are some people you connect with, and some people you half-connect with. I'm afraid that may have been the case with Joan ... But I will work with a ringtail monkey if the monkey has talent. And that lady is very talented." —John Forsythe, on his "Dynasty" co-star Joan Collins, in Entertainment Weekly magazine.

—"My object is to make Ricky Ricardo the hottest dead rock star since Jim Morrison." —"Weird Al" Yankovic, who produced and compiled "Babalu Music! I Love Lucy's Greatest Hits."

—"I've described myself as a humorist when I've put modesty aside, but calling yourself a humorist implies you're actually succeeding, that people are actually laughing. People ask, 'How should I introduce you?' I say, 'Something simple will do. Like, Not since Mark Twain ...'" —Calvin Trillin, in People magazine.

Volunteers Plan For '92

BY JENNIFER WILSON
Staff Writer

The Global Volunteers of UNCW held their last organizational meeting November 17 in the Leadership Center at 6:00 p.m.

The group, presently consisting of ten students, is planning its second annual trip. Between May 11 and May 24, the Global Volunteers will travel to the Appalachian Mountains in either Kentucky or Tennessee and help work on homes for needy families. After the labor is done, they will backpack trails for a couple of days. The whole trip will take ten days.

Last year's members have been meeting throughout this semester to put the trip together. The specific dates have not been decided yet, but will be after spring session final exams and before the beginning of summer session one. Senior Global Volunteers will have to miss graduation ceremonies.

Next semester the Global Volunteers will meet once a month to plan fund-raisers and advertisements for the trip. They will also participate in team building exercises such as going through a ropes course.

The group is still accepting members. Those interested should contact Cathy Birmingham at the Leadership Center at 395-3877

Don't Miss These Bowls On Jan. 1st

The turkey leftovers are still lingering in the back of the refrigerator. The Rockettes have kicked up their heels in front of Macy's department store again. And renditions of "Grandma Got Run Over By Reindeer" can be heard in shopping mall elevators near you.

It can mean only one thing, the merry, cherry, (touch that last energizer battery and I'll kill you), Christmas season is upon us. It also means that the college bowl games will begin shortly and last until the second coming of Christ or I graduate, which ever comes first (I'll lay money on the second coming.)

Not wanting to be caught up in the traditional holiday pushing and shoving this season and possessing a strong desire to get the public informed (yeah...right!), I've listed some alternate bowl games you may not find listed in your T.V. guide.

It is a misprint I'm sure, but knowing the true football fanatic you are, I wouldn't want you to miss out on any of these beauties. So sit back, enjoy the holiday, and as ESPN keeps telling us to do, let's Pigout.

1) The Not-Florida Bowl— No state should house the three best teams in the nation. The rest of the 49 states send their best representatives in a round-robin play-off tournament. A Florida team is later discovered secretly playing in the bowl. No one protests after all it is only the Tampa Bay Buccaneers.

2) Bo's Bowl— If Bo Jackson can't play football, he'll own it. "Just Do It" T-shirts are given out to the players and fans. Teams are the Purdue Boilermakers and the Bo-ston College Eagles. Bo Schembechler broadcasts the game and Bo Diddley plays at half-time.

3) Jimmy Swaggart Bowl— Hail Marys, praying, and speaking with Satan on the sideline headset are allowed and encouraged. Teams slated to play include Colorado and Wake Forest. Colorado has won three games in dramatic miraculous fashion. Wake hasn't, but with a nickname like the Demon Deacons, how could you not give them a bid.

4) The Seahawk Bowl— This is the third straight year the bowl has been held. Ironically, the UNCW Seahawks have won both previous bowl appearances. Unfortunately, the club spent last year's winnings on Bobby Brown's private concert and couldn't finish out their season. New teams figure to be Seattle Seahawks and the New Hanover Wildcats.

5) The Siesta Bowl— Not to get confused with its bigger bowl cousin, the Fiesta Bowl. Sleeper teams, "Yawn!" locked in are Columbia (1-9) University vs. Navy (0-10). Snow White's Dwarf "Sleepy" is head referee.

6) The AT&T Bowl— If you simply can't do something better with two hours, then watch this. A Mickey Mouse phone is given to the winner, along with a 50 cent long-distance calling certificate. Teams slated to play are The Call Waitings and the Tampa Bay Buccaneers. hey, wait a minute, weren't they in an earlier bowl?

7) The Nutra-Sweet Bowl— It is just as sweet as the Sugar Bowl, but half the calories. Sponsors include Large Diet Watchers and Anorexia are Us. Teams playing include Penn State and anyone not named Notre Dame.

8) The Heisman Bowl— Let us dispense with the public relation media hype of big-name schools about their potential Heisman candidates. Instead, all those wanting the trophy meet Jan. 1 on Lambeau Field in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, (the Packers won't be using it at that point in the season anyway) and play one game of "kill the guy with the ball." The last man standing after two hours wins. Now we'll really see athletic ability in action.

9) The Yellow Rose Bowl— By no small coincidence the game is held in the Astrodome in Houston, Texas. Why Texas? Because they do "Big" things in that state and they're also filthy rich. Lady Seahawks Fall to Deacons

BY JIM CLARK
Staff Writer

Coach Sherri Tynes' Lady Seahawks may have lost the game to the Demon Deacons 71-60 Tuesday night, but they won a moral victory. Coming off last week's 94-37 loss at Duke, the team needed a strong game and got it.

Led by Lorraine Cordway's 23 points and Myra Horton's defense, UNCW played Wake Forest even for 35 minutes.

"We played much better than our other two outings," Tynes said. "Except for a five minute lapse in the second half we played well. We regained our composure but couldn't climb back. We didn't capitalize on our chances."

Wake's 13-0 run midway through the second half proved to be too much for the Seahawks. UNCW was only able to close to within six with 1:22 left.

Led by 1991 Olympic Festival East team guard Nicole Levesque's 25 points, six rebounds, five steals, and four assists, the Deacons outscored the Seahawks 51-27 and converted 18-26 from the charity stripe.

"They killed us on the boards and our free throw shooting (25%) hurt us," Tynes said.

"We were pumped for this game," Cordway stated. "Our intensity was much higher tonight."

Zandra Harris, one of the Seahawks' go-to players, sat out all but one minute with a bruised ankle.

"Not having Zandra hurt us," Tynes said, "but we showed pride and potential."

Pat Martin contributed 12 points and six rebounds, Kim Bush had six assists and Joanna Chandler came off the bench with seven rebounds.

"They killed us on the boards and our free-throw shooting (25%) hurt us."

UNCW coach Sherri Tynes

The Seahawks take their 0-3 record to Philadelphia this weekend for games against Pennsylvania and Princeton in the Ivey Challenge tournament.

Tynes is looking for good results this weekend. "We can compete against those teams."

Judging from the effort Tuesday night, the Lady Seahawks have a good, young foundation to build on.

Swimmers Split Meet With Duke

BY DAVID BARNHARDT
Staff Writer

The UNCW women's swim team extended its winning streak to three games with a 147-96 blowout over the Duke Blue Devils in Durham Nov. 23. The win improved the Lady Seahawk's record to 5-1 overall and 4-0 in the conference.

The men's swim team, however, suffered a disappointing 149-94 loss to the Blue Devils. The loss placed the men's record to 4-2 overall and 4-0 in the conference.

"We were pleased with the men's meet in places," Seahawk coach Dave Allen said, "but we were disappointed with the outcome because we thought we could have won."

The men started quickly, but faded fast. UNCW took the early lead with a victory in the 400-medley relay but couldn't capture another win until Steve Burke's victory in the three-meter dive.

The Blue Devils however, were not rattled, and kept the pressure on the young team. Duke won six of the last seven contests, missing a clean sweep when Burke again took top honors in the diving competition, with a win in the one meter dive.

The women's team fared better. The Lady Seahawks also jumped out to an early lead winning the first three races, the 400 medley, 1000 free, and 200 free.

Duke again staged a comeback seizing back the momentum, by taking the next three races. However, the Lady Seahawks proved up for the challenge, stalling the Blue Devils charge, winning six of the last seven contests and the match.

Freshman Cameron King continued to impress onlookers as she broke a school record in the 100 freestyle in a time of 1:38.68. King also set a season best in the 500 freestyle with a time of 5:14.24.

"We were very happy with the win over Duke," Allen said "especially because it was our first win over them."

The Seahawks are on the road next in a non-conference affair Saturday against Charleston.

Senior Matt Fish takes to the air against Mt. Olive. UNCW is 2-2 overall, with wins over Mt. Olive and Drexel and losses to UNC-Greensboro and St. John's.

Jim Clark's NFL Picks

Falcons To Soar Atop NFC West

This is it, the final regular season picks for 1991. I'm hoping the sports editor (God), Patrick Fowler, will let me do the baseball spring training picks. We'll see.

Remember, there are three wild-card teams this year.

Atlanta at LA Rams: The Falcons are play-off bound and will overtake the Saints for the division crown. Falcons 28-16.

Buffalo at LA Raiders: The Raiders can't afford a loss and the Bills aren't playing for much. I'm taking the Raiders 20-16.

Denver at Cleveland: The Browns haven't beaten Elway since the early 20s. But, this time the Browns come through. 27-14.

Green Bay at Chicago: The Bears have had ten days of Ditts and will make the Pack pay for it. 27-10.

Indianapolis at New England: Will the Colts win? Why do we care? Patriots 21-7.

New Orleans at Dallas: The Cowboys are on a roll and the Saints aren't. Cowboys 21-13.

NY Jets at Detroit: The game is indoors, huff and puff. Lions 34-16.

Philadelphia at NY Giants: I don't think the Giants can handle the Eagle defense. Eagles 17-13.

Pittsburgh at Houston: Warren Moon is due and the Oilers need him to have a big one. Oilers 27-10.

San Diego at Kansas City: San Diego will be a spoiler for someone this year, but not this week. Chiefs 21-13.

San Francisco at Seattle: The Niners need a win and the Hawks will oblige. SF 24-17.

Washington at Phoenix: The Skins have another notch for their belt buckle. Washington 28-7.

Minnesota at Tampa Bay: ESPN knew it was exam week and scheduled this no-brainer. Who cares? Minnesota 17-14.

Cincinnati at Miami: This one will be a barn-burner. I expect over 500 yards of offense in this one. Miami 31-28.

Seahawks Finish Third In Tourney

BY JIM CLARK
Staff Writer

The Lady Seahawk spikers ended their successful '91 campaign by finishing third in the Colonial Athletic Association tournament at George Mason University, Nov. 22-23.

Coach Kathy McDaniel was pleased with the results and said the year was an overall success.

UNCW defeated host GMU in the first round 15-5, 15-11, 10-15, 15-8.

"We were prepared and focused," McDaniel said. "They were missing a key player and we took advantage."

The second round featured a match against defending conference champion, William and Mary.

The Seahawks came out strong, winning the first game, but the Tribe's experience proved to be the key to the match. The eventual champs rebounded for a 9-15, 15-8.

5, 15-5, 15-3 victory.

In the consolation game, UNCW had no problem with second seed James Madison University, 15-9, 15-12, 15-9.

"We were focused for JMU and didn't let mistakes affect our play," McDaniel said.

Leading the way for the Seahawks was Kim Cavanaugh, who was named to the All-CAA first team for the second year in a row. Cavanaugh finished ninth nationally in blocks, averaging 1.65 swats a game.

The Seahawks, as a team, finished fifth nationally in blocks, averaging 3.4 rejections a game.

"We peaked at the right time. We started slow and put it all together at the end," McDaniel said.

"We need to beat the big schools like Clemson and Georgia Tech next year," she said.

Legal Consultation Available

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor in chief

If you need some legal advice from a local attorney, you can get it on campus for free. Two Wilmington lawyers will be on campus for a few hours per week this semester to offer students advice on tenant/landlord contracts, traffic tickets, and other small legal problems or questions. The lawyers cannot act as legal representatives through the program.

Attorneys Bruce Mason and Ellen Kiernan from the Wilmington firm of Pennington and Wicks will take part in the program.

Even though students can't actually get legal representation through the service, Mason says that the program can be valuable to students and be worth the $12,180 that the Student Government Association (SGA) is paying for it. The service may be limited, he said, but the price is right. "It would cost [students] a hell of a lot more to come downtown" and have a consultation with an attorney there, he said.

Mason also said that the program would allow students to have a lawyer's advice in situations that they might not hire a lawyer. "It doesn't matter how trivial you think your problem is, we'll be happy to talk to you," he said. Students who get traffic tickets, for instance, could benefit from legal advice before going to court, but probably wouldn't need representation, he said.

Mason said that if a student was in a situation where legal representation was necessary, like for a DWI or drug possession charge, he could give a referral.

The attorneys will be in the SGA office on Tuesdays and Wednesdays from noon to 4:00 p.m., and Thursdays from 1:00 p.m. to 3:00 p.m. The first two hours of each day will be reserved for 30-minute appointments which can be made by calling the SGA office at 395-3553. The last hour of each day will be open for students to drop in. The drop in time should be used by students who have quick legal questions, said Joe Mitchell, SGA student services coordinator, who was involved in organizing the project.

Mitchell said that the service could be changed or expanded during the semester to accommodate students needs. "We're figuring out what the students want and how we can best service them," he said.

Mason and Kiernan might also give lectures on legal topics to interested students and organizations, Mitchell said.

Mason and Kiernan were selected from four groups that made bids to SGA for the program. Mitchell said that bids ranged from $8 thousand to $17 thousand. The two young attorneys were selected after an impressive interview session, Mitchell said. After the interview, "we just knew we wanted them," he said.

The contract between SGA and Mason and Kiernan runs until January of 1993. After that, the contract with them could be renewed, or other attorneys could be employed, Mitchell said.

Wilson Praises SGA Senate

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

Student Body President Curtis Wilson applauded the student senate's accomplishments last semester in his state of the university address Monday.

Wilson mentioned the new services that have been implemented in the past year, such as the "Take a Faculty Member to Lunch" program, the Legal Services program, the new committees and organizations that have been formed within SGA and the new SGA consignment bookstore.

He also mentioned programs that are in formation, like a program that is being formed for students to send messages to each other through campus mail and a program called the "Little Seahawk" to help in the retention of freshmen. "These couldn't be done without cooperation. Without cooperation, we won't get anything done," he said.

Wilson also mentioned the power that SGA has and the limits to which that power can be taken. "SGA can be powerful. Our limits have never been tested because the administration hasn't given us any. We've never pushed the limits."

"Because we're students, we think that we have little power. We have a lot of power. We're why they're here. We have a say."

Wilson said that some of the things that students "have a say" in are issues that are being discussed by the Senate, such as the meal plans and the Faculty Senate's action concerning student attendance of the first class. "They (the administration) can't push us around."

"We're here to help people. We all choose to make the commitment for students to get things done," Wilson said. He said cooperation plays a big part in getting things done. "We need to accept people and what they are trying to do rather than be a road block."

Wilson is working on making the SGA more accessible to the student through promotion. This promotion includes hats, pens, cups and auto shades bearing the SGA motto and location.

The effectiveness of the SGA is being investigated by surveying other schools about their student governmental bodies. Wilson said that the survey is national and he has had several schools respond. "Some schools do better than we do and some do worse. The survey is showing that we are doing fairly well in comparison to the other schools."

Senators and members of the SGA Executive Board said that this year has been productive. "This past semester has been the best productivity-wise," said SGA Faculty Liaison Cathy Birmingham. Senator Ken Lemon said that he had never seen a more effective senate in the four years that he has been involved in SGA. He also encouraged the Senate to keep going as they have been.

Alternative Bookstore Offered

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

This semester students have been offered an alternative to the University Bookstore. And that alternative has given students the opportunity to set their own prices for books that are being sold. This alternative is the Student Government Consignment Bookstore.

The consignment store bought back approximately 650 books overall. These books are being sold by the store at prices set by the students as a service from SGA. Between 350 and 400 of the books have been sold.

"The consignment store is here to help the students, not to make money. We're here to save the students money," said Senate President Pro Tempore Lee Person, who is a member of the committee that organized the SGA bookstore.

The way that it helps the students is that the books are sold to students cheaper in some cases than the prices charged by the bookstore, said Person. One example he offered was the textbook College Algebra and Trigonometry. "That book is being sold for $32 used at the (University) bookstore. We sell it for the price the student that is selling it sets, which has been about $20."

There is a $1 charge by the SGA bookstore added on to the asking price. This charge is being used to pay the staff of the bookstore. "That pays the workers and we haven't made as much as we have paid the workers," Person said.

Though the store has lost approximately $1200, the store will continue. "Twelve hundred dollars to keep $6000 in student's pockets is worth it," Person said.

Though the store has not done as well as SGA hoped it would do, Person said that there are high hopes for the bookstore next semester. "I hope that we can get 2000 books next time. There will be better advertising for it and quicker computers. It will be more open to students and it will not move locations."

Person said, "This couldn't have been done without the workers. They have been great. They've worked hard and done a great job. This also couldn't have been done without Sean (Williams, SGA senator and member of the SGA Bookstore Committee) and Christy (Gunnell, chairperson of the committee), Susie (Goodrum, SGA office manager) has been great. She has put up with a lot too."

Gunnell told the senate that the business was good and that she hoped that the bookstore would be sold out by Friday. She also commended Person for his involvement with the bookstore. "He has been doing a really great job acting as manager. He has been there a lot and I appreciate all the work that he has put into it."

Students whose books are sold will get a check for the amount in their on-campus mailbox. Students whose books did not sell have two options. If they so desire, they can pick up their book Tuesday or Wednesday or they can choose not to pick it up. In the latter case, the book becomes property of SGA. Person said that all the unclaimed books will go to charity.

The SGA Consignment Bookstore will be open today and Friday from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. It is located in the study lounge of the University Union. Tuesday and Wednesday the bookstore will open to return books at the same location and hours.

"Little Seahawk" Program Forms

BY JENNY NEAL
Staff Writer

Often the most stressful aspect of being a college freshman is the loneliness that comes from being away from family and childhood friends for the first time. Attending a college in an unfamiliar city or state can further compound the sense of loneliness experienced by incoming freshmen. The UNCW Grievance Board has developed an idea to make incoming freshmen feel more at home at UNCW. Currently they are developing a program called the Little Seahawk program.

The main purpose of the Little Seahawk program is to make freshmen feel more at home once on campus and hopefully to prevent some of them from dropping out because they miss their family and friends. Krista Habecker explained at the SGA meeting Monday.

The Student Grievance Board is in charge of selecting a group of people to be directors of the Little Seahawk Committee. This committee will plan and coordinate the program. The directors will be selected from school organizations such as the Greek Presidents Council, Residence Hall Association, the Sports Club, Ambassadors, NAACP, Minority Mentors and the Black Student Union. The directors will be selected before surveys are sent out to poll student interest in the program.

"Upper classmen who are interested in being matched with an incoming freshman are encouraged to fill out a survey which will be available the last two weeks in February in the University Center," Joe Mitchell, committee member, said.

Habecker added that the freshmen would be matched with an upper classmen who would be available to answer questions regarding student life and possibly information about the community.

Group activities, such as movie night, will be organized. The upper classmen and freshmen could attend these activities together if they choose to.

Roger Hyman, co-chairman of the committee along with Habecker, and Mitchell each agreed that the Little Seahawk program will enhance the incoming freshmen class' sense of belonging in the community.

Information about the Little Seahawk program will be included in the Freshman Orientation packet. The program is expected to begin in Fall 1992.

Female Condom Put On Market

BY MICHAEL L. MILLENSON
Chicago Tribune

It looks odd and even its supporters concede it takes some getting used to, but the first condom designed to be worn by women is about to go on the market.

In clinical trials, the new condom, also known as a vaginal pouch, appears to be far more effective than male condoms in protecting women from sexually transmitted diseases, while offering roughly equivalent protection against pregnancy.

"The idea of trying to get (some) men to wear a condom is impossible, and women are unfairly being put in the most vulnerable position," said Dr. Mervyn Silverman, president of the American Foundation for AIDS Research and a consultant to the company developing the device.

"I think the female condom has the potential of having a significant effect on empowering women to deal with the epidemic of AIDS," he said.

The female condom will be introduced in Switzerland next month and in France a month or two after that, said George Huber, managing director of London-based Chantex International PLC.

In the United States, the female condom could be available by fall, said Mary Ann Leeper, senior vice president of Jackson, Wis.-based Wisconsin Pharmaceutical Co., which will market it in North America.

A Food and Drug Administration advisory panel is expected to recommend approval of the device at a Jan. 31 hearing. That's just three months after Wisconsin Pharmaceutical submitted an updated application for marketing approval.

"This (panel) has never accelerated an application like this before," Leeper said. "I think Magic Johnson (the Los Angeles Lakers basketball star who announced he had the virus that causes AIDS) has raised everyone's awareness, even the FDA's, about how important it is to get products ... to market as quickly as possible."

The increasing concern about

"When I first saw it (the female condom), I said 'No one will ever use it.'" sexually transmitted disease may prove to be a lifesaver for the female condom, which has attracted widespread skepticism since being invented in Denmark in the 1980s. Wisconsin Pharmaceutical first applied for U.S. regulatory approval in January 1989, but the FDA ordered it to do more extensive tests on the effectiveness and possible side effects of the device.

The female condom is essentially a large, lubricated, very thin polyurethane pouch with an inner and outer ring. The inner ring is inserted into the vagina, much like a diaphragm or contraceptive sponge, while the outer ring of polyurethane is spread over the front of the vaginal area. That protects the woman from contact with sperm or genital sores.

Leeper said company trials showed more than 65 percent of female users and 80 percent of their male partners approved of the device. It is designed for one-time-only use.

"When I first saw it, I said ... 'Nobody will ever use it,'" said Dr. Fredolph "Andy" Anderson, an associate professor of obstetrics and gynecology at Eastern Virginia Medical School in Norfolk. Anderson conducted research on the contraceptive effectiveness of the condom and its esthetic acceptability.

"But it's amazing," he added. "The people who liked it (in clinical trials) really liked it and want to continue to use it. It's like anything else. Some people will like it, some people won't."

One couple who took part in a six-month clinical trial said they liked the pouch because it was easy to use and less likely than regular condoms to break. But another couple, who had used the contraceptive pill before taking part in the trials, said they found the pouch less spontaneous and somewhat comical.

Clinical trials of the female condom, with 1,700 women showed that it had a leakage or defect rate of 0.6 percent, one-sixth of the 3.5 percent rate of male condoms. Wisconsin Pharmaceutical said. The female condom tears less than 1 percent of the time; the tear rate for male condoms is 1 to 14 percent.

One reason is that the pouch is made out of a thin, medical type of plastic, whereas latex rubber is used in most male condoms. (Condoms made of animal skin are not approved for disease prevention by the FDA. However, latex can deteriorate if not stored and used properly.)

The pouch is also less likely to cause vaginal infections than a diaphragm, its makers say.

The female condom will sell for $2 to $2.25 each. Male condoms typically sell for about 70 cents each.

Just who is most likely to use the female condom remains an open question. Development of the condom was funded in part by the U.S. Agency for International Development, which sees a desperate need for women in the developing world to protect themselves against diseases such as AIDS despite living in cultures where men are often reluctant to wear condoms.

In this country, Wisconsin Pharmaceutical so far has chosen the name Reality for the pouch as a reminder of the risks of disease. But Chantex, which holds the rights for the rest of the world, uses the softer name Femidom.

Huber frets that the Reality name stresses disease prevention too heavily. "I don't think a product that's foreseen as AIDS-oriented will be adopted as a mainstream contraceptive," he said.

Leeper said her company will decide before the FDA hearing whether to go along with the Femidom name.

Recession Affects Students

BY HUNTLY COLLINS
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

White-collar workers aren't the only ones feeling the brunt of the national economic downturn.

Throughout the country, the recession is forcing more cash-strapped college students to work while attending school and to choose a college on the basis of economic rather than educational factors.

Those are among the findings in a recent survey of 210,739 college freshmen at 431 schools around the country. The survey, to be released Monday, is conducted annually by the American Council on Education and the University of California-Los Angeles.

"Taken together, these figures suggest that neither financial aid nor personal or family resources are keeping pace with the costs of attending college," said Eric L. Dey, a UCLA researcher.

The survey found that the percentage of students who selected a college on the basis of low tuition had jumped from 23 percent in fall 1990 to almost 28 percent last fall.

The number who chose a college on the basis of how much financial aid it offered also rose, from 25 percent in 1990 to almost 28 percent last fall. Those who picked a school because it was close to home went from 20 percent in 1990 to 21 percent in 1991.

More than 7 percent of those surveyed said they went to college because they were unable to find a job, the highest percentage citing that reason since the last recession in 1982.

Nearly 38 percent said there was "a very good chance" they would have to get a job to help pay for college expenses, and nearly 5 percent said they expected to work full time during college.

Given the difficulty in paying for a college education and uncertainty about the economy, it's not surprising that nearly 75 percent of those surveyed reported that making money was a "very important" reason for their decision to attend college.

The figure was the highest since 1971, when the question was first asked on the survey.

Support for a national health-care plan also reached an all-time high in 1991, with nearly 76 percent of the freshmen saying they endorsed the idea.

As the nation gears up for a presidential campaign, conservative candidates can expect less support among college students, survey findings seem to indicate.

For the second straight year, the percentage of freshmen who characterize themselves as politically liberal or "far left" increased, from 24 percent in 1989 to 26 percent last fall. The number of "conservative" or "far right" students continued to decline, from 23 percent to 20 percent over the same period.

Sensitivity to the problem of date rape is growing on campus, the survey found.

A record-high 87 percent of those surveyed said they agreed with the statement "Just because a man thinks that a woman has led him on does not entitle him to have sex with her." Men, however, were three times more likely than women to disagree with the statement.

While business remained the most popular major and career choice of freshmen, interest is waning. Sixteen percent said they would pursue a business career, down from a peak of 25 percent in 1987.

Survey director Alexander W. Astin, a UCLA education professor, said the drop might reflect a reaction against insider trading, the savings and loan debacle, defense-contracting scandals and other "business excesses" of the 1980s.

Customer Support Technicians

Shelf Life.

When you think of high quality personal computing products with staying power, you think of Microsoft. We wrote the book on operating systems with MS-DOS. Now, Microsoft Windows graphical environment version 3.0 is fast becoming the interface of choice throughout the world.

Products like Microsoft Word, Excel and Works, to name a few, have stood the test of time...and we're working on revolutionary ideas right now that will become tomorrow's software classics.

Our best-selling products don't stay on the shelves for very long. They're the pride of our top-line team of software professionals.

As a Customer Support Technician, you'll welcome the chance to use both your communication and technical skills to their fullest.

You'll support Microsoft applications by answering telephone calls from end users, helping them troubleshoot problems. These can range from the very basic to the highly technical. In the course of your work you'll broaden your skills in a variety of software applications and programming languages. Most important, you'll help set new standards of quality customer service for Microsoft's outstanding software products.

If you are about to graduate with a Bachelor's degree in Computer Science, Electrical Engineering (with Computer Science emphasis), Math, Physics, Management Information Systems or a related discipline, are familiar with PC-based technology and are eager to learn a variety of applications, languages and tools, we provide solid technical training to get you started. If you can listen to technical questions, solve complex problems, and effectively communicate solutions, we want to talk with you at our On-campus Interviews.

We are an equal opportunity employer and are working toward a more culturally diverse workplace.

Here's A Swift End To Homelessness

When I went home to Charlotte over the Christmas break I walked the Uptown streets and saw the same lost, disillusioned and hopeless souls haunting them. The faces may have changed, I really don't remember any, but the souls remain the same. While governments and organizations strive to remedy the homeless and hunger problems plaguing the city, their efforts, which have had some success, continue to face increasingly insurmountable odds. There are many persons not seeking the aid offered who will work for food and sleep in cardboard boxes, while others do not realize the resources available. My solution to this critical problem is one I don't want financial reward for because I feel it will, and should, benefit all. So this is not only a solution to this pressing national problem, it is a modest proposal too.

Since most of the United States is carnivorous, it is time we used all available meat sources. Though it may seem horrific, my proposal, if taken seriously, will become as accepted as sushi and escargot (Americans will eat anything if it is chic and/or avant garde). The food we can capitalize on is increasing in number steadily every year, costing money and the time of countless caring individuals and there is no end in sight. By making use of this plentiful resource we will help satisfy this country's hunger pains and help resolve the homeless situation. The food source I'm referring to is, of course, human flesh.

Because there are so many homeless that have no chance of being productive members of society and are only living by the handouts of others, their existence is a hindrance to the progress of our civilization. There is, however, a means by which these persons can still contribute to the progress. The homeless can become a food for others.

Initially, the thought of cannibalism should turn stomachs, but in the end could fill stomachs instead. Human meat probably has a distinct taste that will take some time to acquire. If prepared by professional chefs, human flesh will no doubt please even the most discriminating palate, and from those who follow no dietary guide and are thankful for any food they get, no complaints should be heard.

Because the number of persons used to feed others, though growing, is limited, their meat can be processed with more conventional meats: cow, pig, and sheep. This will stretch existing food inventories and help kitchens offer varying menus. Because human flesh hasn't been characterized as a breakfast, lunch, or dinner food, it can be integrated into all three. For those whose stomachs would turn at the thought of eating human flesh, consider the contents of sausage and hot dogs. Human flesh could be combined with "accepted" foods designated for hunger kitchens and prove cost and nutritionally beneficial.

The nutritional benefits from human flesh have not been formally disclosed and I believe they have been buried for "humanitarian" reasons. Some of you may believe the information should remain hidden because the very thought of eating another person's flesh is revolting, but I believe the long term benefits far outweigh contemporary modes of politically correct thought. In time, human flesh entrees could be found on the menus of the finest dining establishments throughout the country.

The process that determines which individuals will be selected to feed their fellow man is not one which is easily explained or yet determined. There are many factors that will need to be considered. I propose those who have been homeless for two years or more should be the only ones considered for human consumption. From that point, medical teams will determine if the flesh is consumable, and psychological groups will evaluate the candidate's mental capacity, but that order hasn't been determined.

Obviously, if the candidate is cancer-ridden or has been poisoned by drug use he will be discarded. Only the choicest meat will be used to help fellow humans back onto their feet.

If the candidate, through rigorous testing, shows potential mentally, he will be housed, cleansed, and taught the skills he is most capable of using successfully.

The homeless that do not qualify for consumption or education are still considered for benefiting man. Because there are many people whose prolonged existence is dependent on an organ transplant, the remaining homeless will be tested for compatibility. If a homeless individual is able to prolong another's life, his life will be spared.

There are so many other factors in determining who will be considered for human consumption and by what means we will go about it it would be ludicrous for me to think this document should be considered gospel. Much hard work is still to be done in finalizing my proposal, but I believe it is feasible and a means to satisfy the homeless problem in America today.

If, by chance, you feel you can formulate a better program or contribute to an existing one, it is your duty as a human to do so.

ARA Is Giving Us A Raw Deal

The new semester brought a big change in the hours of the Hawk's Nest, the snack bar in the University Union. Because of a lack of business, the dinner hours were eliminated; the Hawk's Nest now closes at 3:00 in the afternoon.

The elimination of those dinner hours means a smaller range of food choices for students (including, admittedly, members of the Seahawk staff) who find themselves on campus late in the day. The arrangement is doubly inconvenient for those who do not have meal plans on campus.

This isn't the first time that food policies on campus have made eating inconvenient. Use of meal cards in the Hawk's Nest was restricted last semester, and declining balance cards are still available only to those who purchase a Wagoner Hall meal plan, one which is often inconvenient for commuter students to use. Now our food service is limited further.

The cafeteria in Wagoner Hall and the Center Stage Cafe in the University Center will still be open for dinner, but the price ranges and choices of food will be reduced. The menu at the Center Stage Cafe will be augmented slightly to include a salad, potato, and pasta bar. However, because the Cafe doesn't have the equipment to cook pasta and bake potatoes, they may have to be shipped after cooking to the Cafe from the Hawk's Nest. It seems hardly disputable that the quality of that cuisine will be diminished during shipping and handling.

In a market economy, businesses often have to curtail services in response to low consumer interest. For example, USAir has cut the number of flights from Wilmington's airport because the planes simply weren't being filled with passengers. Who can blame them for cutting flights that aren't profitable? But the rules that apply to an airline or another company that has to compete for business don't really work with ARA, the food service company at UNCW.

ARA enjoys a contract at UNCW which prohibits other companies from serving or catering food for any event on campus. In other words, they are not subject to competition — the basis of a market economy. ARA has a monopoly.

It seems fair then, that if ARA is practically guaranteed a customer base on this campus, that they could give some extra consideration to students here. Even if those dinner hours at the Hawk's Nest aren't the most profitable for them, they should stay open for the sake of those students who want that type of food service. ARA certainly enjoys its monopoly on campus, but it should take the bad with the good.

The students who fill ARA's coffers deserve a little more consideration.

I Tossed And Turned Over Christmas Break

I don't hardly know where to begin. So much has happened during the month (that is 720 hours in case you wanted to know) that we have been out. I hope everyone had an enjoyable holiday and returned safely to UNCW (everyone except for the thousands of freshmen who acquired 0.13333 grade point averages and decided college might not be for them).

I was almost unable to return to school this semester. You see, I was a guest at a state dinner in Corinth, N.C. Actually it was a New Year's Day lunch at my grandparents' house, but since it was a dinner and in the state, I can call it a state dinner. Anyhow, I apparently came down with a sudden bout of the intestinal flu. The room began to spin and all my relatives suddenly looked Japanese. The next thing I knew I was lying on the floor, dazed and weak. My uncle Akahito was holding my head, and everyone was asking me if I was okay. "Yes," I responded. "Grandma's chili sure does pack a punch." I was attempting to divert attention from my bare-covered self.

I soon recovered and went into the living room to lie down. I was later horrified when I learned that Uncle Mort had caught the whole thing on his Panasonic camcorder he got for Christmas (I think the darn thing is surgically attached to his shoulder). He put the tape in the VCR and insisted I watch it. There I was, eating black-eyed peas and turnip greens when suddenly I threw up, slumped over into my plate, and sank to the floor. Uncle Mort played the tape twenty times and plans to send it to America's Most Disgusting Home Videos.

Well, that is enough about my near death experience with the presidential intestinal flu. What I really want to talk about is the wonderful holiday and six month (okay, it only seemed like six months) break we had. Maybe it is just me but after the third week, I was wanting to come back to school. Now, after only a few days back, I think I could stand another break. There were however, some redeeming things about the holiday break. I went skiing over the break and had a wonderful time. It was only seventy-five degrees on the slope, with a three inch packed ice base.

There was plenty to watch on television, from the Barbara Mandrell Christmas special to the Lawrence Welk Rocking and Rolling New Year's Eve Bash. I personally watched CNN the whole time, hoping to catch a glimpse of our President tossing his Teriyaki Chicken all over the Japanese Prime Minister.

The best and most important thing about Christmas is of course, presents. I got all kinds of presents from friends, relatives, and as always, Santa Claus himself. Yes, the jolly old fat man still visits our house on an annual basis. This is despite the fact that we have no chimney, have dead-bolt locks on all the doors, and our pet Rotweiler (Precious) is roaming the yard. I guess that is the magic of Christmas.

As always, I got a smattering of odds and ends. I got shirts, pants, shoes, and socks. I got gadgets and gadgets, and toys and games. I even got some things that I have no clue as to what they are. So in honor of those Christmas presents (we've all received them at some point) that you just smile, say "Thank you" for and hope the instructions are in English, I present for you my list of the five best Christmas gifts for 1991.

1. From Time-Life video, the thirty-six volume video collection of the proceedings of the Clarence Thomas confirmation hearings. It also includes a free copy of Long Dong Silver's latest release (featuring Anita Hill).

2. For the car owner, a ten gallon vat of "Color Coat 200." This is that space age polymer car wax that has been on T.V. lately. I can be used to fix up old cars sitting in a junkyard, repair the damage when you accidentally sandblast the paint on your car, and it allows you to grill steaks on the hood of your Porsche without destroying the taking off five pounds to changing life direction, unless such change is rooted in the real hunger that comes from the very center of who we are. I mean, think about it! Resolutions to take off a few pounds rarely make it past the next hunger pang, much less the first weekend. Giving up being busy sounds great during the Christmas holidays, but results of one week's worth of meetings or classes blows our intentions all to pieces. So where then is change really rooted? Can we, in fact, change our behavior?

The answer is yes. The issue is rooted more in our heart (our center) than our head and sustained more by meditative prayer than commitment lists taped to our bathroom mirror. I would like to suggest that we think more in terms of spiritual intentions than resolutions.

Our habits did not develop over night and are, in most cases, more the result of life-long developed values and lifestyles. Change is not simple or easy. But change is important and change we can.

Whether you think of it as a force of life or, as I do, God, we are inherently invited to grow and to develop, to be and to become. We are daily given a fresh start and hope is endemic to our human nature.

Change demands real attentiveness to our deepest hungers and the truth of our hungers is rooted in that mysterious roomier: at the very center of who we are between ourselves and the love of God. It is as we descend with our minds into our hearts that we can see ourselves truly, and begin to sense the directions we are called to grow and change.

So many of our resolutions are rooted in negative feelings about ourselves. In our hearts, we discover our potential and also the power to support the directions in which the spirit of God may be leading us.

So take your resolutions, find quietness for yourself and see if any of them are rooted in some positive, loving hungers from center Self. Know that the power of these hungers is rooted in and sustained by some form of daily connection to the love that God has for you and all he invites you to be.

May your hungers guide you and deep silence sustain you for all of 1992.

Happy New Year!

Reconsider Your New Year's Resolutions

Happy New Year!

New Year's Resolutions—What a crock! Every year we look at the things we would like to change in our lives and make a list of a couple of things that we decide are going to be different. And how long does it last? Some last a week, maybe two; but it's a rare resolution that survives the January doldrums.

I think the reason for this is that our resolutions are so shallow. The needs to which they speak may be very real and the desire to change equally as real. But most of our resolutions are rooted only in our minds' assessments of our lives and are not rooted in the real source of power of our personal existence.

❖ I do not believe that we are ever going to make any real changes, large or small, from showroom lust. Rumor about the White House is it that it can also be an effective remedy for the intestinal flu.

3. A new T-shirt from Fruit of the Loom which says on the front "My President Went to Japan and All I Got Was A Lousy Recession." On the back is "The 1991 Bush World Tour," and goes on to list all of the foreign places he has visited last year including Germany, Zimbabwe, and Washington, D.C.

4. A most valuable gift is the $2,000.00 gift certificate to the campus bookstore. I received one of these this Christmas and I am using it as a down payment on my Organic Chemistry book. I was going to use it to buy a pack of paper, but my Walmart gift certificate will serve that purpose better.

5. And a most memorable gift for this season is the Time-Life video production of The President Has Spoken. Recount the horrible moments when our beloved leader passed out and his wife began blurring out one-liners to divert attention. Re-live the devastating moment when all of the world thought Dan Quayle was going to be the President of the United States. Recount the exhilarating moment when the President awoke and said, "I've fallen but I think I can get up!"

Well friends, if you didn't get any of these gifts then perhaps you deserve a spot on the evergrowing welfare list. I hope you did have a good break and are looking forward to a good semester. Until next time... keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

It's Tough Getting Into the Groove

It's never easy coming back to class after an extended vacation. My friend and I were grumbling about this overdecaffeinated coffee in The Hawk's Nest Monday morning (the real coffee maker was down again). Actually, grumbling was just about all we were capable of as we sat bleary eyed and caffeine deprived.

"Ummff wann gerohmbed," my friend muttered.

"Huh?" I asked, desirous of clarification.

"I want to go home and go back to bed!" he clarified.

"Oh," I replied, and returned to counting the chocolate chips in my muffin.

"Ummff thinahldoot," he mumbled.

"Look," I snapped, "if you're going to talk to me, why not pick your face up off the table."

He turned his head towards me. "I said, 'I think I'll do that.'"

"Well, that would set a marvelous precedent for the first day of classes now wouldn't it?" I retorted. "Come on man, shake it off. You know it's just the post-holiday blues." I tried to smooth over the previous criticism. It never does to be harsh in the morning, especially without caffeine. That's a good way to start a shooting spree or something.

"Oh, what's the point," he griped. "What the hell am I doing here anyway?"

He sat up suddenly and turned his semi-wild and crumb encrusted countenance on me. I subtly began to scan him for suspicious gun-shaped bulges. Looking into his baggy, red-rimmed eyes, I could see that he was still too sleepy to have cracked yet. I relaxed and awaited the rest of his commentary.

"Why are we here man?" he asked me. "Have you thought about that lately? What have we spent the last three years of turmoil, struggle, and strife for? We could have stayed out in the work force and earned money all that time!"

I started to remind him that, at the rate he had been earning as a carpenter, he would only have made about forty thousand or so over the entire three years. I also wanted to toss in the fact that, given the present economy and housing slow-down, even that pittance would be threatened. I wanted to say these things, but something about the way his shirt seemed to stick out at his waistband made me hesitate. Was that a flash of blue steel?

"Are we here to get an education, or are we here to get jobs?" he went on.

"Do you think the two are mutually exclusive?" I asked him.

"Of course they are!" he exclaimed. "I mean, what use is it to know all about H. D. Thoreau or to be able to quote Sartre? Who cares? Even teachers don't need all that education. All they have to be able to do is read the teachers' guides and run a mimeograph machine."

"This whole extended education thing is just a sign of an overly opulent society... it's a posh luxury. I believe we need to return to the days of apprenticeships. Practical experience... that's the way to get a job!"

"A lot of college courses offer excellent practical training," I argued. He was really getting out of line here and I had to risk tickling him off. "Look at the business school. Think about doctors and scientists. Without education, these people would still be in the dark ages."

"Who needs businessmen or doctors anyway?" he challenged.

"We've already got too many of them. Without the higher education systems, these parasites on society would never have come to the status they now hold. The world would be a better place."

"If we weren't so hung up on money and material things, we wouldn't even need businessmen. And who do you think makes us believe we need these things anyway? It's businessmen! They convince us that we need their products so they can take their hard earned money. It was businessmen who did away with the old barter system. It was businessmen who led us into social stratification and separated the haves' and have-nots."

He paused and I started to interject some rational thinking into his spiel. This was as far out in left field as I had ever seen him, and I've seen him get pretty far out before. I knew this must be a result of his tortured physiology, frustrated in his struggle to strain caffeine out of the pseudo-coffee he was drinking. Again I found myself looking around for anything bulletproof that I might dive behind when the shooting started.

"Doctors are the same you know?" he started again, before I could say anything. "They are the ones who have convinced us that we need them. They get together in their little AMA groups and dream up new ailments to terrify their sheep-like patients into mass treatments for obscure diseases or some new plastic surgery techniques."

"Who do you think it was who came up with the plan to use silicon breast implants, then scare the hell out of everybody by saying that they, like everything else in the world, cause cancer? It's a great scam. You convince the women that large breasts are preferable to normal ones; then you get them to spend a few thousand dollars having the implants. After you've brought down a few million bucks doing this procedure, you start a panic so the same women come screaming back, begging to spend a few thousand dollars to have the things removed. A brilliant plan, I must admit."

I shivered. He was starting to make sense. If I didn't get some caffeine soon, I was going to start going along with him. Oh, this was bad! "Hey man," I ventured. "How about we ride over to Hardee's for some real coffee?"

He stood and tucked in his shirt. There was nothing in his waistband after all. I relaxed a little. "Let's do it!" he agreed. "On the way over, I'll tell you why scientists are all a waste of a good body and mind."

I just nodded and headed for the parking lot. He was basically silent for most of the walk. I began to hope he had run out of warped ideas. I was getting a headache.

"It all boils down to my original point," he went on as I unlocked the driver's side door. "If we want jobs, we should get out there for on the job training. If we want education, then we have too much time on our hands and need to go out and get a job or something. You know what I mean?"

I started the engine and checked the rear view mirror. "Hey man," My friend shouted. "Unlock the door! I can't get in! Hey, wait!"

I jammed the gearshift into reverse and pulled away. My friend stood open-mouthed as he watched me drive off in search of caffeine and intelligent conversation... with myself. Phillip Loughlin is a regular columnist for The Seahawk.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dear Editor,

I must address an ad I saw recently in The Seahawk extolling the merits of Vivarin as a study aid. How many of you have ever experienced a Vivarin "high" the night before an exam? Let me tell you how it affected a friend of mine.

She, like many of us, had left a great deal of studying to do the night before a major History exam. So many dates... so little time. She relied on Vivarin (a powerful CNS stimulant) to give her that extra boost that would keep her going through the night. Not being an avid coffee or Sundrop consumer, she had a fairly low tolerance to caffeine and therefore felt the effects pretty quickly. Following her first dose she felt unusually energetic and active. Although she was wide awake, she had difficulty concentrating. As the night wore on, she took a second dose to ward off any threatening yawns. Now her heart was beating so fast it was distracting. She felt jittery and anxious and was even sweating a little. Nevertheless, she continued to try and cram as much as she could while in this accelerated state of mind.

Finally, dawn came and soon she was hurrying off to her 8:00 exam (not time for breakfast, of course). As she sat down and pulled out her paper, she began to see all the dates and times swimming before her. She was confused, disoriented and by now very worried about her performance on the exam.

By midmorning, she was exhausted and was having trouble just keeping her eyes open. She even felt a little sick in her stomach. She felt as if there was a "gap" between her eyes and her head" and all of her thoughts were somehow floating in between. She finished the exam — tired, frustrated and depressed. She didn't fail it, but she knew she could have done a lot better if she hadn't... well, you know.

Just Don't Do It

The last day of the last month of this century has come and gone. Another new year has begun. It is at this time that millions of people insist on declaring their desires of starting anew, making amends and breaking bad habits.

It is at this time of the year that I start verbalizing my disgust for such nonsense. Who thought making resolutions was a good idea anyway? (I would also like to address the traditions of black-eyed peas, collards, and white rice and scales, but I'm afraid they are beyond my comprehension, and gullibility.)

I for one refuse to get caught up in all the "I'm going to do the impossible" hoopla. My only resolution is the same every year: To not make any resolutions. I read about a couple who actually write down their resolutions and place them in their Christmas stockings. What fools. If I made resolutions, I certainly wouldn't want to be reminded of how miserably I had failed at them. I say destroy all evidence. Memories tend to fade over a twelve month period, especially when alcohol is involved, so there's a good chance the only one who will remember is you.

I have found from past experience (before I caught on to this resolution-dental thing) when making a resolution, keep it ambiguous. The more ambiguous the better.

For example: "This year I'm going to lose weight." At the end of the year you can say with pride that you did indeed keep your promise and not be lying. So it takes eleven and a half months to lose that 1/2 of a pound. Who's counting? Of course that last week of the old year will somehow (from the inner depths of miraculous mathematics) turn that 1/2 of a pound loss into a ten pound gain, but who's counting?

Studies show that out of a hundred people who make resolutions, 97 will break them within two weeks. I tend to look at this as a positive sign. Can you imagine how disgustingly perfect this world would be if we all kept our resolutions? ... Well, okay, so maybe it wouldn't be all that awful. But the thought of everyone failing in their attempts makes me feel a little better, a little less guilty for not having made one at all.

My best friend and her husband resolved to start jogging. I told her if I could find a sturdy bra I'd be right there with her. I was lying of course. Even if I could find a reliable bra (hopeless at best) I still would not be "right there with her." In all actuality I would be several paces behind, gasping for breath, clutching helplessly at the earth, cursing and hoping my friend was within that 97% who quit after two weeks.

If I was forced at gunpoint to make a resolution, with the understanding that there would be a resolution grace period, say, about 300 days minimum, I guess it would be to abstain from my current obsession of Dark Chocolate Milky Way Frozen Bars. The attempt would be futile.

Approximately fourteen days from now I would be measuring my freezer to see how many of those 5 x 1 1/3 Dark Chocolate Milky Way Frozen Bars would fit into a 4.2 cubic foot freezer. And after, oh, two days, of devouring all of those I would probably come to my senses, and swear off my obsession once again ... and after two more weeks I'd be looking into how much a bigger freezer would run me.

Go, that "take off a half of a pound in only eleven and a-half months" diet is sounding pretty good right about now. Yeah ... Right!

Father Of The Bride Has It All -Including A Headache

BY D. NEAL LEEPER
Entertainment Writer

It's Saturday night and you are taking that special someone out for dinner and to a movie. But what movie do you see? Do you want to see something funny, serious, dramatic, violent, or depressing? How do you make your decision? Easy, tune in to the bi-weekly column FAST FORWARD. In this column, I promise to let you, my soon to be faithful readers, know the truth about all the latest motion pictures. With this in mind, let's continue with a review of my favorite of the Christmas season, FATHER OF THE BRIDE, starring Steve Martin.

Men who have daughters lead a life of nervousness, anxiety and paranoia. Their little girls start off so beautiful, tiny and innocent, only to advance to an active teenager. This is the part in a "Daddy's" life which they dread the most, their daughter's interest in boys. As quoted by Steve Martin in the film, "You don't like these guys, because you know exactly what they want ... because it's the same thing you wanted when you were that age."

After the dating games and high school proms, the girl leaves home. Instead of worrying about her meeting "a guy," her parents worry about her meeting the "right guy," and this is what happens to Steve Martin.

Martin, who plays a shoe company president in beautiful California, anxiously awaits the arrival of his daughter from Rome, where she has been studying abroad for the past semester. His little baby girl shows up for dinner, but with a pleasant

Big Money Comedy Is An Oxymoron

BY MIKE DUFFY
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

LOS ANGELES — It's an odd situation. Seinfeld actually sounds a little bit antisocial "Seinfeld."

Actually Seinfeld, the wry comic who specializes in droll observations of everyday life, may just have a big hit on his hands. And that sort of worries him. Not that he ever really feared that his NBC series, a wittily unique and offbeat variation on situation comedy, would fail to make it. He admits he has always possessed a sunny "ignorant faith in the show."

"I just always feel if you're genuinely funny without gimmicks, tricks or trends, you can pretty much write your own ticket."

Of course, Seinfeld, who is creatively involved in the show, didn't know much about TV, anyway. He figured such tactics as being showed around on the schedule were perfectly normal.

But now, after two years of bobbing about fairly anonymously in the NBC prime-time lineup, "Seinfeld" is generating some real heat.

"Hopefully, we'll not realize we're getting popular," Seinfeld said the other day. "Success is the enemy of comedy."

But even Seinfeld senses the change that's in the air. "It does feel like there's something about to happen," he said.

Casually dressed in jeans, sneakers, a plaid shirt and a blue blazer, Seinfeld took a break from the show to talk with several TV critics last week.

"We've been this cult thing up to now," he said. "We've had a loyal, small group of people watching us. Now that's about to change."

NBC, in fact, is betting on it.

Last week, "Seinfeld" was officially moved into the important 9 p.m. ET Wednesday time slot, opposite ABC's very popular "Doogie Howser, M.D."

In a recent test run against the Doogster, "Seinfeld" dealt the teen sabbath his lowest ratings of the year. Oh, Doogie still won. But the trend is obvious. "Seinfeld" is moving on.

And Jerry Seinfeld doesn't want to sacrifice what has made his show special.

"If you start thinking this is important or that we need to be more careful, or that we need more money to do it right, then you're in trouble," he said. "Big-money comedy is an oxymoron."

With "Seinfeld," it's not just the ratings that are beginning to click. Also coming together are the head members of the cast. Besides Jerry, who's essentially playing himself, a thirty-something stand-up comic living in New York City, there are his ever-present friends: anxiety-ridden George (Jason Alexander), eccentric next-door neighbor Kramer (Michael Richards), and gal pal Elaine (Julia Louis-Dreyfus).

"I think the characters are starting to look like they are really friends," Seinfeld said. "There's a new comfort level. And that's a big part of this show. You've got to want to hang out with these people."

Seinfeld, a Brooklyn native who spent 13 years honing his stand-up comedy skills in clubs and with concert performances and TV appearances before the pleasant serendipity of "Seinfeld," has known Richards for years. Both used to work on the old ABC late-night cult comedy, "Fridays."

Now all four "Seinfeld" cast members hang out together off-camera.

"That's just luck," Seinfeld said. "You can't figure four people are going to get along like that off camera. And that shows up in our on-screen chemistry."

(unpleasant for Martin) surprise: she's met that special man while in school and is now engaged.

Needless to say, Martin is not happy, after having to deal with wealthy in-laws of Bel-Air, and typical weddings in sunny California which are not complete without the assistance of a "wedding coordinator," played by Martin Short. Short plays an extensible man with a strong feminine accent and the knack to keep the audience laughing.

Short helps with all the wedding plans, from the $1200 cake, to the walking swans in the front yard. After the wedding is planned and the cost evaluated, the figure topples $250 per person, and with 500 people on the guest list, that amounts to a pretty penny. How does Martin deal with this? That's something that you will have to find out for yourself.

I admit that I am a strong Steve Martin fan, and if you like to be entertained, you will enjoy this film. If you dislike the comedies with sweet, and "Oh, how nice!" parts in it, you might have a hang-up with this flick.

Many girls here at UNCW will be facing marriage in the future, and this definitely presents a different approach to the big day: the view from Dad's eyes. And many future fathers attend UNCW also, so it should appeal to them too.

FATHER OF THE BRIDE has it all, and you won't be disappointed with it. Out of a possible ten points (on the FAST FORWARD scale) this film receives an eight for "Go see it, you'll love it. You won't be disappointed!"

Until next time.

Clearly, "Seinfeld" has a very special, low-key personality.

"It has this unfettered quality," Seinfeld said. "It doesn't look like it came through the network system."

In fact, it doesn't look like it came through any system. These four friends aren't enslaved by conventional sitcom nonsense: dumb situation, dumber joke.

"There's a different tone to what we're doing," Seinfeld said. "We don't change the situation to fit the joke. We try to play the situation out the way it is in real life. We don't look for what is the most outrageous thing. We look for what is the most boring, normal thing that could happen. Like not being able to find your car in a parking garage."

That particular scenario of contemporary urban annoyance filled a whole episode of "Seinfeld."

So did the night Jerry and his pals stood in line outside a Chinese restaurant. Just last week, the friends spent the evening on a subway train.

Finding the humor in ordinary, everyday situations and frustrations can strike a very funny chord.

Alas, poor Jerry hasn't really had much time to reap the benefits of his growing TV stardom. He's still the typical comic, of course. "One of the chromosomes got twisted (at birth). And from then on, everything you look at is twisted."

In his scuffling days, Seinfeld sold $1 jewelry on the streets. And he can easily recall his worst moment in comedy — going down in flames as a 22-year-old novice in a big room at a Catskills resort hotel.

"I had all my jokes about Gf Joe and growing up and it's just dead, total silence. And in a big room, you feel like you're just falling through space."

Today, Seinfeld's working an even bigger room — the main ballroom at the Global Village. Why do you think they call it prime time?

You can sense he's aware of the pressure, which is why he expresses a certain dismay about the notion of mass popular success.

Clearly, though, he cares. He cares so much that you could say "Seinfeld" has become the comic's magnificent obsession.

He's always working, he said, always at the office, totally wrapped up in making the show as good as it can be. The hours are long and longer, day into night.

This doesn't leave much time for extenuating romantic circumstances. And the single Seinfeld has only one real infatuation right now. Work is his main squeeze.

"I'm in this position," he said, bemused by his own predicament. "I'm single and successful. But I'm not available. I have nice sports jackets, a nice car. I know where the good restaurants are. But I'm unavailable. It's like I'm married."

Even the notoriety of being named one of America's 10 most eligible bachelors by Cosmopolitan magazine wasn't exactly a blessing. There's something strange about those hot, unsolicited letters from desperate women.

"Those are the most desirable women," Seinfeld said, giving it the full sardonic twist. "These are the women who sit down and take pictures of themselves with Polaroid Swingers. And then they write letters with crayons in their fist."

Doesn't sound like Jerry Seinfeld's kind of woman anyway. But Kramer, now he's definitely a Polaroid Swinger kind of guy. Or have we bumped into another oxymoron?

Legal Services

Thanks to Joe Mitchell, once again another student services is being added to our growing list of accomplishments. Joe has been working on this service for quite some time and is excited the way it is unfolding.

"This legal services program is to provide personal legal advice to students in such areas as: landlord/tenant, traffic court, contract liability, small claims court, legal rights issues, and many others. These are among those many legal issues which students can resolve themselves, provided they have the proper legal guidance, consultation, and advice on legal issues, with the hope that students will take this and be able to resolve the legal problem."

As the brief paragraph states, this legal service will be directed toward issues that you can handle yourself. The Student Government has acquired the services of Bruce Mason, who will work 2/3 of the allotted time, and Ellen Kernan who will work the other 1/3.

Hours for Legal Services will be:

Tuesday 12:00 - 4:00pm
Wednesday 12:00 - 4:00pm
Thursday 1:00 - 3:00pm

The last hour of each session will be devoted to drop in consultation, all other time is set up for 30 minute appointments. The legal services will be held in the Student Government Office U.U. 200; and appointments may be made by dropping by or calling 395-3553.

If you have any questions please feel free to call Joe Mitchell at the SGA office 395-3553.

Barry W. Graham, Vice President.

Barry has served as the Special Student Senator / President Pro Tem for the 1989-90 term and most recently last semester. Barry is the newly elected Vice President after Kelli Shafer stepped down at the end of the fall semester. Barry has served as the Chairman for the Orientation Committee and has served on the Parking Appeals, Chancellors Investigating Panel, and Student Media Board. Barry's personal goal has always been to see that the students are represented to the fullest extent.

In the future, Barry plans to continue to serve in the SGA in any capacity that is deemed necessary to ensure that the students get a voice in what is happening on campus. "I aim to make sure that they (the students) are getting their money's worth."

Barry does think that the students are being informed thanks to the efforts of President Curtis Wilson and Line Dempsey who is our editor of the SGA Update.

They Said It

UNC-Wilmington basketball coach Kevin Eastman opening statement to the media following the Seahawks' overtime loss to 25th ranked UNC-Charlotte, 89-99.

"There are no more moral victories on this club anymore, not while I'm coaching here."

Same Old Fish Story

It was a golden opportunity. A chance for respect and recognition. A turning point in an upcoming program. And it faded away with UNC-Charlotte junior guard Delano Johnson's 21-foot three-point prayer as it ripped through the bottom of the net and through the hearts of Seahawks players and fans in Trask.

True, the shot only tied the game for the 49ers at 87, but it might have just won it, the momentum was gone, the upset had been averted.

UNC-Charlotte had new life, and made the Seahawks pay dearly for it. The 49ers ran off 12 points in the extra five minute period while holding UNCW scoreless 4:57 of them and coasted to a 10 point win, 99-89.

Head coach Kevin Eastman said after the game it was not his most frustrating loss, but one has to believe it hurt. The 49ers, although disputed by some experts, were ranked 25th in the nation.

A Seahawk victory would be a major coup. A win pumps up team confidence levels. It also boosts the recruiting program.

UNCW would finally be recognized as a quality program and gain some respect for the often overlooked CAA conference, who until now, has only been acknowledged through the recent success of Richmond and Navy in the NCAA tournament.

Eyes would be opened, as the Seahawks ball team realized there are other teams in this conference who can challenge the highly ranked division one programs.

A win would mean a turning point for a young program that is still rebuilding. The Seahawks last winning record was in the '88 season when the club posted a final mark of 16-14.

Winning seasons' marks of 15-14, 18-12, and 16-13 preceded that as the Seahawks were in either the conference tournament semifinals or finals, four straight years.

Granted those past great teams have had highly talented players on them, like Brian Rowson in '86-'87 and junior college transfers Larry Houzer and Antonio Howard in '88, but UNCW can not use that as an excuse. The '92 squad may lack a true marquee player or players but it has both solid talent and depth in its program.

Newcomers Keith Adkins (13.2 ppg) and John Spann (3.5 ppg) have played exceptionally well in games for UNCW this season. Kenneth Aldrich has rebounded from an off year last season to pour in 7.5 points per game while Tim Shaw has bounced back from an early season injury to be a force on the offensive boards.

Center Matt Fish, in addition, is off to his best season ever. The senior is leading the league in field goal accuracy (68 percent), second in rebounding (8.83 rpg.), and fifth in scoring averaging 17.9 points a game. What the Seahawks lack more than talent is team consistency and confidence.

It was a lack of composure that allowed the 49ers to slip away from the Seahawks Jan. 6, not bad play.

The Seahawks were up five points with 35 seconds remaining in the contest but missed 3 out of 4 free-throws in the final second in addition to sending the UNC-Charlotte players to the foul line, which stopped the clock.

These mental mistakes enabled the 49ers to creep back into the game and put them in position to tie it. An opportunity UNCW never should've gotten.

That shakiness in play was also evident in both weekend games against James Madison and Richmond.

The Seahawks were down only four to the Dukes (36-32) at halftime but lost their concentration and cool as the Dukes outscored them 16-6 over the first seven minutes of the second period.

Four of those 16 points came on an ill-advised break technical foul. The foul and four point swing crushed a mini UNCW run and the Seahawks never recovered, losing 87-68.

Monday against Richmond, UNCW held tough but again were their own worst enemy. The Seahawks' defensive mental lapses in both the first six minutes (11-2 run) and final two (12-5 run) of the game allowed the Spiders to avoid the upset and win by nine, 82-73.

Eastman would refer later in the press room to an old coach's adage to why Richmond escaped, "The good team find ways to win."

That is exactly correct. The Seahawks aren't a good team right now. Eastman has used the word mediocre but the club is better than that. UNCW has shown they can play with the better teams in Division I.

The problem is they don't finish the job they start, a shortcoming they need to overcome to be successful. The opponents will only get tougher as the season goes on.

Sophomore Drew Phillips, showing frustration on his face after the Richmond contest, stated the team still hadn't played a full forty minutes of solid basketball. He's right.

The question is not, can UNCW challenge more talented Division I programs, but will they.

That proof comes in a win.

Until then UNCW can only talk about the big fish that got away.

UNCW men's basketball team has never defeated a top 25 ranked opponent in its history. The Seahawks have come close several times, the most recent after the UNCC game was over then-third ranked Indiana in '86 at the Indiana Classic in Bloomington, Indiana. UNCW-Wilmington played even for 32 minutes Monday evening with pre-conference favorite Richmond in Trask coliseum, unfortunately it was the eight remaining minutes that did the Seahawks in, who fell to the Spiders 82-73.

Sophomore Drew Phillips said after the game that the team hadn't played a full forty minutes.

UNCW (6-7 overall, 0-2 in CAA) whittled at the Spiders' small six point lead the entire second period, and finally cut the margin to a duce on back to back backdoor dunk feeds from UNCW senior Matt Fish (17 pts.) to junior Tim Shaw (20 pts.) with 2:48 remaining. That was as close as the Seahawks would get.

Following a Richmond timeout, the Spiders outscored UNCW 12-5 in the remaining time and picked up their tenth win of the season.

"The good teams find ways to win," Eastman said. "However, by hanging in the game we show we can bounce back from a tough loss. Our guys showed that they are pretty resilient on the court."

UNCW lost at home Saturday to James Madison, 87-68.

Senior Curtis Blair (21 pts.) and junior Kenny Wood (16 pts.) led the Spiders' attack. Wood from the low post area and Blair from the foul line. Sophomore point guard Gerald Jamon added 17.

The Seahawks came out flat in the first six minutes of the game missing their first four shots and turning the ball over twice on fouls. Richmond (9-4-2-0) took full advantage running out to a 11-2 advantage on jumpers by Wood, Jim Shields, and a three-point shot by Jamon.

The Seahawks would battle back and close the gap to three points at the midpoint of the period. The Spiders twice staked leads of six points but strong plays by Fish and Phillips in the final five minutes of the half kept the lead from getting any higher.

The duo scored the final 16 points for UNCW in the period. The Seahawks maintained in striking distance at the half, down five, 40-35.

"It was coming to easy for us in the beginning and I knew it wouldn't last," said Richmond coach Dick Tarrant said. "Fish really leads this team well."

The Seahawks shot better Monday (48 percent) than Saturday (40 percent) but couldn't overcome either mental lapse in either quarter and only led in the game once. A 28-27 lead late in the first half.

"We had some slip-ups," Shaw said. "The other teams play 40 minutes, so we have to too."

UNCW went 3-2 over the Christmas break picking up wins against Appalachian State (75-72), Stetson (90-87), and Queens (87-70). The Seahawks lost to Charleston (53-63) and 25th ranked UNC-Charlotte in overtime (89-99).

The UNCW game was tied on the final play as 49ers guard Delano Johnson sent the game into overtime with a 21-foot three-pointer at the horn.

The Seahawks go on the road for the next two contests, both conference games. UNCW plays at George Mason Saturday before traveling to Bender area to take American on Monday. Game times for both contests are 7:30 p.m.

'Hawks Put Their Best Feet Forward

BY PATRICK FOWLER
Sports Editor

The UNCW track runners have one thing on their mind this season, "to move up."

Head track coach Bill Cason said the goal of this year's team is to finish higher in the Colonial Conference Track and Field Championships at the end of the season.

The Seahawks placed fifth in the men's competition last year while the women's team took a sixth place finish.

Both squads according to Cason will look to improve and score more points in other track events than the distance events where the Seahawks have flourished.

"We're going to try to move into track events this year that we haven't had anyone do in the past," Cason said. "We'll be doing more jumps, hurdles, and will try to strengthen the relays."

Cason will look to get help in the events from his freshman and newcomers to the sport. The track team will hold an open meet Feb. 22 in hopes of attracting new athletes to the sport.

The Seahawks '92 squad is composed of mostly cross-country runners but Cason is optimistic about others coming out for the season.

Last year, the Seahawks picked up valuable points in the throwing competitions as seniors Sissy Baker, Molly Messer, and junior James Jacobs joined the team as walk-ons.

Baker, holds school records in both the shot put (30-1.5), hammer (101-11), and discus (103-11) throws. Jacobs also holds school records in the three throwing events for the men's team and placed fifth overall in the CAA Championships in the hammer throw in '91.

The high jump and the sprints are two other areas that Cason wants the Seahawks to improve in '92. Junior Eric Young and senior Nicole Delaine are the top two returnees for UNCW this year.

Young, who enters his third track season as the Seahawks' high jumper and sprinter, holds the school high jump mark with a leap of 6-11. Young was forced to sit out the '91 season after injuring his heel at the third meet of the year.

Delaine, meanwhile is UNCW's top female sprinter. The Clayton, N.C. native holds five individual records in the 100, 200, 400 and is part of three relay record teams. Delaine qualified for the East Coast Athletic Conference in the 100 meter and reached the meet semi-finals. The top three finishers in each track event qualified for the NCAA Championships, held in early June. The senior also placed fourth in both the 200 and 400 at the conference championships.

"Nicole (Delaine) and Eric (Young) will again be a plus for us in both the short distance and field events," Cason said. "I look for more improvement from them as the season progresses."

However, the strength of UNCW is still in the distance events.

The men's team will be paced by senior Shawn Britton and junior Sam Bobbitt. Britton won the 3,000 steeplechase for the second time last season at the CAA Championships and holds the school marks for 3,000 (8:31) meter run and steeplechase. The senior also is UNCW record holder for the 5,000 meter indoor distance.

"Shawn (Britton) is our first two-time winner and has a good chance to win three," Cason said.

Bobbitt is an All-CAA cross-country performer for the second straight year. The junior placed fifth in the conference championships last season and will again look to challenge Britton for the top position at the middle distance. Juniors Larry Jackson, Jared Hagg, sophomore Kristen Agnew, and freshman will add to the Seahawk depth in the middle and long season. All four enjoy solid cross-country season.

The Lady Seahawks will look to junior Amy Jackson and senior Kris Scott to lead the women's team this season. UNCW's 1-2 combination are both All-Conference cross-country runners.

Jackson finished sixth in the CAA Cross-Country Championships this season and placed third last season in the CAA finale in the 3,000 meter. Jackson also holds the track record for one mile.

Scott is close behind. The senior captured her second straight All-CAA honor in cross-country by placing right behind Jackson in seventh place overall. This is the first season Scott has run track. The Seahawks will also get support from Jill Peeples, Lalonnice Walker, and freshmen Heather Felton and Michelle Melton who show strong promise in their first cross-country season.

UNCW begins its competition Jan. 24-25 at the U.S. Air International Meet in Johnson City, Tenn. The team's first home meet is Feb. 22 when the Seahawks host the Seahawk Track Classic.

UNCW runners are gearing up for the '92 track season. The team first meet in Jan. 24-25 at the U.S. Air International Meet in Johnson City, Tenn. The team first home meet is Feb. 22.

Winless Streak At 11 For Seahawks

BY JIM CLARK
Assistant Sports Editor

The Lady Seahawks opened conference play this past weekend against James Madison University and the University of Richmond with disappointing results. Coach Sherri Tynes hopes it was a learning experience.

Saturday, a sluggish first half by UNCW gave JMU a double-digit lead it wouldn't surrender. Lorraine Cordaway and Joanna Chandler led a second-half comeback that cut the lead to 12, but the Lady Dukes were able to recover and went on to post a 91-68 victory in front of an excited and loud crowd of 3,700.

Cordaway finished with 23 points, Chandler and Myra Horton each added 12, and Zandra Harris scored ten.

"We only played at 65 percent tonight," Tynes said of her team's play. "We had only one good half."

That half was the second. The Lady Seahawks shot 56 percent from the field and hit 14 of 16 free throws and forced JMU's starting unit back onto the court to stem the rally.

In Richmond Monday night, UNCW suffered a total collapse of team effort. "We lacked execution and hustle," Tynes said of the 93-54 loss.

The Seahawks fell to 0-11 overall and 0-2 in the Colonial Athletic Conference.

Again, as in Saturday's game, the Lady Seahawks fell behind early and weren't able to recover. Richmond led 21-3 with ten minutes to go in the first half and steadily increased the lead with all eleven players scoring at least four points. Harris and Pat Martin led UNCW with ten points apiece. Kim Bush handed out six assists.

Lady Spider senior Ginny Doyle continued her NCAA Women's Basketball streak of consecutive free throws by sinking both her attempts. She has now hit 61 in a row.

The lack of experience (one senior and no juniors on a team of ten) and a go-to player has hurt the team, but Tynes says it's not an excuse.

"We've been successful when the five on the court play together," Tynes said. "We get more rebounds and commit fewer turnovers."

"We haven't been healthy lately, but we need to play through the bumps and bruises. We need to get tougher mentally."

Senior Susan Kelly agreed stating it would take a lot of heart to turn the season around.

"We need to come together as a team," Kelly said. "We have a lot of individual talent, but we're not playing well as a team."

Tynes hopes a couple of days off and playing as home this weekend will bring the team around.

The Lady Patriots of George Mason University will be at Trask Coliseum Saturday at 3 p.m. UNCW plays American on Monday at 7 p.m.

UNCW Graduate Wins Miss NC

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor in chief

A recent UNCW graduate is leaving her home in High Point for Wichita, Kansas in hopes of becoming Miss USA.

Tess Elliott, who graduated last December with a degree in speech and communication with an emphasis on marketing, was crowned Miss North Carolina USA in Greensboro last November. She was also voted Miss Photogenic there. Elliott's awards for winning included a tailored-made wardrobe, a diamond ring, travel to and from the national pageant in Kansas, and $2000.

The Miss USA winner will travel almost continuously throughout the year, and receive prizes including a car and a boat. The total package is worth about $250,000.

Elliott, who taught aerobics while attending UNCW, said she wants to make a career in the health and fitness industry. She said she would also like to attend graduate school to study exercise science. Someday she would like to host a fitness show.

The Miss USA pageant will be carried live on CBS television Feb. 7.

SGA Bookstore Complete

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

Student Government Association members are declaring their new bookstore a success, but admit that it has lost money. Students who sold their books at the bookstore still haven't been paid for them, and Joe Mitchell, student services coordinator, said that he doesn't know when they will.

Mitchell predicted last fall that the bookstore would make a profit. Now as bookstore losses top $1200, Mitchell said that the program has been a success and will be continued this summer.

"We learned confidence in the system. We didn't know what the response would be."

"There are other ways to decide if something is a success other than by the money it earns. It was a success for the students who bought and sold books there."

Bookstore manager Lee Person, said the consignment bookstore as of last Wednesday the bookstore had lost approximately $1200, but the final figures have not been determined yet. "But $1200 is worth giving $6000 back to the students that they might not have gotten otherwise," Person said.

The money that was lost on the bookstore came from an account for the new Legal Services program, said Joe Mitchell, student services coordinator. How exactly it will be replaced has not been determined. Mitchell said that there is enough to run the Legal Services for the remainder of the year. "SGA has an extra $20,000 in the budget and that is enough to pay for it. We have money and there will be money for next year so there are no problems," he said.

Christy Gunnell, bookstore committee chairman, said, "SGA will back us. The money will probably come from the sky fund." The sky fund is made up of money that student organizations did not use by the end of last year and had to give back to SGA. Mitchell said that money is unallocated or, "gone to the sky."

One reason Gunnell cited for the lack of business was that the students were, "leery about trying something new. They did not know what to expect since it was the first time."

Students not being able to immediately get money was a problem for the new project. "But that is a factor in any consignment store. Some people want more money and are willing to wait for it. Others need money then. It is a financial decision on the part of the student."

Mitchell said that the consignment bookstore is an option that is offered to the students and that it is not offered as competition for the University Bookstore.

Mitchell, who came up with the idea of the bookstore along with Gunnell, said he was pleased with the results from the first time. "We learned a lot this first time."

Mitchell and Gunnell said that the results of a survey of other schools with the same program were similar but with time, the programs turned into successes.

Mitchell said that for the next time of operation, which will be spring book buy-back, there will be more defined roles for the bookstore. "The role of the committee, of the chair and the manager will all be better defined."

Some of the things that the money earned was used for included salaries for the workers in the store, publicity, office supplies and "insurance to cover stolen books just in case," Mitchell said.

Republicans Prepare For Primaries

BY S.A. PAOLANTONIO
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

MANCHESTER, N.H. — In the early stages of the nation's first primary, Patrick J. Buchanan has the White House on the run.

But many Republican voters in New Hampshire and GOP strategists around the country wonder whether the conservative columnist has the political resources and broad-based appeal to go the distance against President Bush.

Buchanan's "America First" rhetoric and biting witisms have hit hard in conservative New Hampshire, standing in stark contrast to Bush's plummeting approval ratings and inability to articulate a clear re-election theme.

But along the way, Buchanan, an aide to Presidents Richard M. Nixon and Ronald Reagan who has parlayed his conservative inquest into national celebrity, has also managed to irritate Jews, blacks, homosexuals and women.

Moreover, though New Hampshire voters continually press him for specifics on key issues such as health care reform, Buchanan has promised more substance but failed to deliver.

A Boston Globe poll published Sunday showed Buchanan's negative ratings had risen sharply since a poll in December. Thirty-three percent of the 400 Republicans polled viewed Buchanan favorably, but 27 percent expressed negative views. By comparison, Bush's favorable rating was 56 percent among New Hampshire Republicans, while 21 percent expressed a negative view.

"I like Pat because he's conservative and I think he'll be tougher on the Japanese and Congress than Bush, but I just can't picture him in the White House," said Bob Baker, 46, a plumber who lives in Concord. "He's too unpredictable."

But like dozens of other New Hampshire Republican voters interviewed over the past two weeks, Baker said he planned to vote for Buchanan to send Bush an indelible political message that people are hurting and blame a smug White House approach to the economy for most of their problems.

And despite Buchanan's escalating negative ratings, polls show that the columnist, who has never before run for public office, is gaining on Bush.

White House strategists are worried that Buchanan is within striking distance of breaking 40 percent of the vote on Feb. 18 in New Hampshire, and they have retooled their campaign.

The president's cabinet and Vice President Dan Quayle have visited New Hampshire, and Barbara Bush is due Thursday in Keene. But most of the surrogate campaigning has been viewed with scorn by voters who say the president's failure to campaign more often contradicts the message of caring he tried to convey last week when he made his first visit since the 1988 presidential campaign.

Supreme Court Hears New Abortion Case

BY LINDA P. CAMPBELL
Chicago Tribune

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Supreme Court said Tuesday it will review the constitutionality of Pennsylvania's abortion restrictions, raising the profile of the abortion-rights battle in this presidential election year.

The justices will hear arguments in the case in April, with a decision likely by July — shortly before both parties are scheduled to hold their national conventions.

The court's announcement came one day before the 19th anniversary of the landmark Roe vs. Wade ruling, when demonstrations on both sides of the issue are expected to be held in Washington, Chicago and other major cities. In a precursor of those protests, District of Columbia police Tuesday arrested hundreds of anti-abortion protesters blocking the entrances to two abortion clinics.

The brief order issued Tuesday indicated that the court may not rule on the broad question of whether abortion should remain a constitutionally guaranteed right, as provided by Roe vs. Wade. But it is not precluded from doing so.

The order indicated the justices would focus on whether the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia was correct in upholding most of the provisions of the Pennsylvania law, which set restrictions on a woman's right to terminate a pregnancy.

Roe legalized abortion nationwide, declaring that the choice of abortion is a fundamental constitutional right. However, in 1989 the justices gave states new leeway to regulate abortions, leading to intense debate over whether Roe had been undercut and was ripe for reversal.

"The Pennsylvania case places the neck of Roe vs. Wade squarely on the judicial chopping block this term," said Roger Evans, litigation director for the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, sounding the message of alarm that abortion-rights activists echoed throughout the day.

American Civil Liberties Union lawyer Kathryn Kolbert said the court could not uphold the Pennsylvania restrictions without overruling Roe because they were identical to other requirements ruled unconstitutional in 1986.

The National Right to Life Committee, the nation's largest anti-abortion group, said the court "could and should reconsider Roe" in this case, but in any event should uphold the Pennsylvania law.

Helen Alvar, an official with the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, said abortion-rights groups were approaching the case with a "panicked reaction" that "points out more clearly than ever how utterly out of step" they are with the American public.

The Pennsylvania case, Planned Parenthood vs. Casey, has been a focal point for activists on both sides of the issue because it presents the most direct challenge to abortion rights since the 1989 Supreme Court ruling in a Missouri case, Webster vs. Reproductive Health Services.

As a result of Webster, Pennsylvania and other states passed restrictions on abortion. Some, such as Louisiana and Utah, banned abortions in most cases. The result has been at least seven court challenges, with Casey the first to reach the U.S. Supreme Court.

The 3rd Circuit upheld most of the Pennsylvania law, including a provision that would impose a 24-hour waiting period and require physicians to give women certain information about childbirth and about agencies offering abortion alternatives; a requirement of parental consent for minors seeking abortions; and a provision that physicians file reports on each abortion performed. The appeals court struck down a provision requiring a married woman seeking an abortion to notify her spouse.

The Supreme Court in 1986 struck down an earlier version of Pennsylvania's law but has since upheld the constitutionality of parental-notification requirements in other states. In its Webster ruling, the court upheld a Missouri law that barred the use of public employees or facilities for abortions not necessary to save the mother's life and required a viability test for fetuses at least 20 weeks old.

Although the Pennsylvania law does not ban abortions, abortion-rights activists contend that the 3rd Circuit ruling in effect gutted Roe vs. Wade by adopting a new standard for weighing the constitutionality of limits on abortions.

The appellate judges said that, in light of recent high court rulings, the regulations did not have to be narrowly tailored to advance a compelling government interest. Instead, the court said, the regulations could be upheld unless they imposed an "undue burden" on a woman's exercise of her abortion right.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor has advocated the undue-burden test, but it has yet to be adopted in any case by a majority of the court.

Lawyers with the ACLU, which is representing Planned Parenthood in the current case, contend that adopting the undue-burden test, or any other standard that leaves the Pennsylvania law standing, would have the effect of overruling Roe and eliminating women's fundamental right to choose abortion.

Recognizing that the conservative court has become increasingly willing to accept abortion restrictions, abortion-rights activists insist there is no practical difference between letting states impose restrictions on abortion and allowing them to ban the procedure altogether.

Head Start Bush, Congress Debate Funding

BY MITCHELL LOCIN
Chicago Tribune

WASHINGTON — It sounded like politics as usual Tuesday as Congress opened its election-year session.

President Bush proposed spending $600 million more for Head Start, and congressional Democrats demanded even more. The Senate opened debate on a Democratic-sponsored education plan, and the Republican administration threatened a veto.

But there was one difference, which was highlighted by the swearing-in of Pennsylvania Sen. Harris Wofford, the Democrat whose upset victory in November carried a powerful message heard at the White House and the Capitol.

"If there is one message from Pennsylvania, it is that they are tired of politics as usual," Wofford said after being sworn in to fill the rest of the term of the late Sen. John Heinz, a Republican.

Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., the Senate minority leader, said Congress "has one simple assignment: Do something, and do it quickly for a change."

And they did. Republicans, who last fall blocked the education bill, joined Democrats in voting 93-0 to begin debate on it.

That unanimity, however, doesn't mean there was widespread agreement over the measure's contents. Republicans hope to reshape the bill to match the president's education goals, called America 2000, for elementary and high schools.

But even where there was substantial disagreement, there were signs of a growing realization among members that the public wants them to forgo obstructionism and to reach consensus when possible and compromise when it isn't.

Sen. Warren Rudman, R-N.H., speaking about economic revitalization, the biggest topic Congress and the president will deal with this year, said he had no doubt that despite all the different plans that had surfaced, agreement would be reached "because I think the country demands it. ... I do not think we will have deadlock on this. Neither party can afford that."

Playing with children at a Head Start program in Catonsville, Md., a Baltimore suburb, Bush sought to make good on a 1988 campaign pledge to fund fully the program that helps prepare low-income children to enter school.

His proposal to add $600 million would bring the Head Start budget to $2.8 billion, more than doubling it over the three years of the Bush presidency. It would allow 157,000 more children to participate in the program, which now enrolls 622,000 youngsters, allowing "every eligible 4-year-old child whose parents want them to participate to have the Head Start experience," Bush said.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., chairman of the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee, labeled the funding pledge "an election-year handout" and called for a $5 billion boost over five years to cover 2 million low-income 3- and 4-year-olds.

Providing Head Start services to every eligible child was one of six national education goals agreed to by the president and the nation's governors in 1990. It may prove to be far less controversial than other elements of the debate over schools that the Senate began

Abortion

"The right to obtain an abortion means being able to have the procedure," said Kolbert of the ACLU. The court "could leave a shell" of Roe, she said, but "the reality is that, for women in America, the states will have the power to stand in her path when she makes this fundamental choice."

Of the seven justices who composed the majority in the 7-2 Roe ruling in 1973, only Justice Harry Blackmun, who wrote the decision, is still on the bench. Chief Justice William Rehnquist and Justice Byron White dissented from Roe.

Justice John Paul Stevens, who joined the court in 1975, has supported Roe in subsequent abortion cases. Justice Antonin Scalia has said Roe should be overturned. O'Connor has criticized the ruling but has been unwilling to vote to overrule it. And Justice Anthony Kennedy supports broad state regulatory power over abortions.

Little is known about the abortion views of the newest court members, Justice David Souter and Clarence Thomas.

Anticipating defeat in the high court, the ACLU and Planned Parenthood on Tuesday announced renewed efforts to build their case in the political arena and force the issue into the forefront of the presidential campaign.

Kolbert said abortion-rights groups would push hard for a federal law guaranteeing abortion rights or a constitutional amendment, if necessary. Efforts are also under way to pass legislation at the state level protecting access to abortion.

"We must convey to every elected official — from the president on down — that the issue of abortion and birth control will not go away until women's rights are protected," she said.

Debate

Tuesday.
The heart of the Democratic plan developed by Kennedy's committee is an $850 million program for states to develop plans to improve schools and fund programs on the forefront of change, such as Chicago's local school councils.

However, Education Secretary Lamar Alexander has recommended that Bush veto the Democratic measure unless it is substantially changed to conform with the president's education program.

The Democratic bill, Alexander said, "is a block grant to all of the people who are now in charge of a system that doesn't work very well."

The president's plan calls for the creation of 535 schools throughout the country using the latest educational theories.

Expected to be the most contentious issue, however, is whether parents would be able to use federal funds to send their children to private schools.

Under the Democratic bill, school districts could allow parents to switch students only among public schools. A Republican amendment supported by Bush would allow six school districts to experiment with giving parents the choice to move their children with federal assistance to private schools.

"We want to give poor families more choices of the schools that rich families already have," Alexander said.

Debate on the bill is expected to continue through the week.

College Bowl Contest Starts Jan. 27

BY BRAD ROGERS
Staff Writer

The College Bowl — "the varsity sport of the mind" — will take place in the Center Stage Cafe, located in the University Center, on Monday, Jan. 27 and Thursday, Jan. 30.

The competition will consist of a moderator, who will ask questions valued at either 10 points for a toss-up or 30 points for a bonus question, according to Student Activities Coordinator Wendy Ahrens.

Team members will buzz in if they think that they know the correct answer to a toss-up question. If correct, the team will receive the according number of points ruled by the judge and a chance at a 30 point bonus question.

Questions covering a variety of subjects will be asked, including current events, math, pop music and history. Serving as moderator will be Frank Tascone, student activities advisor. John Johnson, director of Residence Life will be judging the contest.

The College Bowl, sponsored nationally by the Association of Campus Unions International, is locally sponsored by the Student Activities Office. Monday's competition will be the first round with Thursday's round being the final round.

"The winning team will be eligible to participate in the regionals in Blacksburg, VA at Virginia Tech," Ahrens said. "It will be an all expense paid trip."

Potential teams have until Friday to register for the competition. The team should consist of four players, including a captain and two optional alternates. In the fall competition, there were 8 teams. Ahrens said.

All students are eligible to participate. Interested teams or individuals should contact the Student Activities Office in the University Union, room 202. All captains must attend a mandatory meeting Monday at 5 p.m. in the University Center meeting room.

"The important thing is that students can come watch, whether signed up or not," Ahrens said.

where does he go after that?"

In New Hampshire, Buchanan can blanket the state cheaply.

By March 10, however, he will have to battle Bush and the state GOP organizations in 10 primaries simultaneously, a logistical nightmare for a candidate in his first nationwide contest.

In addition, another Republican challenger, David Duke, will be competing with Buchanan for the same conservatives who have abandoned Bush in New Hampshire.

"My estimate is that Buchanan will cease to be a serious candidate after Super Tuesday," said Robert Franks, chairman of the Republican Party in New Jersey. "His act and his resources will have been stretched too thin."

In the long run, Republicans say, Buchanan doesn't worry them because they consider him unelectable.

His remarks that the Israeli lobby pressured the United States into the Persian Gulf War has angered Jews. He said AIDS was "nature's retribution" for homosexuality, angering gays. And he's staunchly anti-abortion, a position that limits his ability to attract support from some independents and women, experts say.

"The job of the columnist is to be provocative, but as a politician it is self-limiting," said Steve Salmore, a political science professor at the Engleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University.

"He may do well in New Hampshire because he's a nice fit ideologically. But the question is

Bush

Buchanan has amassed 2,000 volunteers in the state and plans a media blitz of his own, including TV, radio, billboards and direct mail in excess of $1 million, according to political director Paul Erickson.

Meanwhile, Buchanan has already started planning for the Maine caucuses on Feb. 23 and the host of primaries on March 3, Erickson said. The state Republican Party in South Dakota successfully fought to keep Buchanan off the ballot there for the Feb. 25 primary.

The Republican establishment's efforts to shut down Buchanan's march failed in Georgia, Maryland and Rhode Island, Erickson said.

Council For Clubs Forms

BY STACIE GRANT
Staff Writer

In an attempt to create more unity between campus organizations, a new council involving organizations and clubs on campus is forming. The Council of Organization Leaders (COOL) is a group whose purpose is to "represent all registered groups on campus and promote greater awareness between campus organizations," said Brandi Goertemiller, Student Government Association senator.

COOL would include campus organizations, registered groups and fraternities and sororities. Each member would elect a delegate to represent their organization at meetings. "We hope that the group will be a beneficial component of the UNCW community. The group will be a representative structure of all campus groups. It would also provide a way for the Student Activities Office to re-register their clubs, which must be done once a year," SGA Student Services Coordinator and Student Grievance Board Chairman Joe Mitchell said.

Some of the things that Mitchell hopes that COOL will accomplish is acquiring speakers from within the university community projects, such as charitable events. Mitchell said that he is looking at a possible initiation of a Fall Festival event where all the clubs involved with COOL have events and booths. A dance sponsored by SGA with backing from COOL would also be held.

What will happen at the basic COOL meeting is that "each member will report what their organization is doing at the time," Goertemiller said.

The idea for the organization was proposed last fall by Brian Bullard, Jeff Holeman and Susan Simpson. "Their meeting went extremely well, but was not followed through with," said Mitchell. "Last semester I met with Susan Simpson, regarding the re-formation of COOL. She was extremely interested in this and met with the Student Grievance Board. Since then we have been working with Mandy Hartman and Wendy Ahrens."

The group's first meeting is Wednesday, February 6, at 7:30 p.m. in University Union, room 100. It is open to all interested students.

Think About The Holiday—And You

Well, the Martin Luther King, Jr. holiday came and went, probably without much notice from most students at UNCW. However, a few students came to a campus NAACP meeting Tuesday night to discuss where American stands today, 24 years after King's death. Judging by the discussion at that meeting, he news isn't too good. King's dream is still alive, they decided, but it is still a dream.

That is unfortunate but true. While progress in integration of blacks into the mainstream of society is evident in the increasing numbers of blacks in college and professional careers, it can hardly be argued that equality of races hasn't been achieved.

Surprisingly, the people at that meeting, all of whom were black, said that their rise toward equality is being resisted by members of the black race as well as the white. They also said that the lack of a leader like King in today's world is hampering their movement.

The one thing that was noticeably absent from the meeting's discussion was any sort of "white-bashing." Members of the NAACP as well as all members of the black race could easily blame all of their problems on whites, but they didn't at this meeting. Their emphasis on self-reliance was evident and is admirable. The sad part is that, without everyone's help—including whites—equality will never be achieved.

So, instead of singing the praises of Martin Luther King, or writing a poetic verse about his famous dream, The Seahawk will make one request of all of its readers.

Take a few minutes to take a really hard look at yourself. Do you have ill feelings toward another racial group? If your answer is an immediate "no," then think again. When was the last time you told, or laughed at, a racial joke? When was the last time you made fun of the way someone of another racial group talks? Did you have anything to say about the Martin Luther Holiday that you wouldn't say to a black person's face?

You might think that these little racist acts don't mean anything, but they do. Every time you do something like that, you perpetuate a condition which has to be the most disgraceful in America today. So think about it—really think about it.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dear Editor:

I was pleased to see an intelligent and responsible solution to homelessness in your last issue, "Here's A Swift End To Homelessness," by Jim Clark. With all the idealistic bleeding hearts spouting off about giving to the poor, it was refreshing to find a realist with a common-sense approach to our nation's problem.

I wish to add my contribution to Clark's proposal by filling in some gaps he left open.

First, I have a suggestion about the selection process of the prospective diners that will redefine the American menu. They should, of course, include the healthy homeless who are presently just taking up space. However, because the homeless may be underfed and therefore may provide only small amounts of food, I feel that we should move on to consuming other undesirable in our society. The possibilities are endless!

Feminist Flambe. Diced and Battered Democrats. Communist Cacciatore. Hot Homosexual Fondle. Ecologist Eclair. I'm getting hungry just thinking about it!

My second suggestion concerns those sickly individuals that Clark suggests should be "discarded." These could be put to good use in our booming cosmetics industry in place of those poor, helpless bunnies and kitties who are tested to determine the safety of products. With humans being used instead, the results would be more effective. I, for one, would feel much better about eye shadow if it were being tested on some society leech than if an innocent animal were sacrificed.

Again, I'd like to thank Jim Clark for opening an issue that's been closed for too long. I hope we can get together for lunch sometime and really take a "bite" out of homelessness. Sincerely, Gina M. Gammon, Student

The Fault Rests With The Abuser

I get these headaches all the time. I think it's something to do with my back. Usually, a couple of acetaminophen or ibuprofen will handle the pain for a few hours. Other times, nothing but time helps.

Several years ago the pain was really intense and I had to do something. Ignoring the advice on the box which says never to take more than six tablets in 24 hours, I took four ibuprofen capsules at once. I followed these with four more about two hours later. Maybe they helped the headache. I can't say for sure. You see, I was doubled over with stomach cramps and nausea. For all I cared, someone could have bashed my head into a wall with a heavy framing hammer. I was too busy hoping I would die to ease the stomach pain.

This brings to mind the time I had a bad case of Wild Turkey's revenge (A.K.A. the morning after disease). Between each run to the toilet, I took a long slug of some pink bimism solution. Before the noon hour, I had killed a whole bottle. My digestive system was two full days recovering its normal functions.

A year or two later, reading some articles about drug abuse and legalization, I read about some people who, like me, had disregarded the information on the back of the box. I was lucky—those people died. It's not like they were doing the high powered stuff, alcohol, percodan or valium. Mild stuff like cough medicine was killing these people. People were giving their kids excessive doses of "safe" pain medicine. Some folks had even bought it from over-the-counter on laxatives.

I guess it's time to get to my point. Recently, The Seahawk seems to have come under fire for a certain advertisement promoting a caffeine based stimulant as a study aid. While I have my personal doubts as to the validity of the company's implied claim, I have to say that their marketing team has done its homework. They know that the majority of college students will be up late during finals. They know that these same students will be trying to cram 25 hours into a single day. They know also that for these folks, sleep is going to be considered a major inconvenience. And they have just the thing for these bleary eyed scholars... the equivalent of two cups of strong coffee in one tiny, easy to swallow tablet.

But while the advertisement makes the product look like the miracle drug (don't all advertisements try to do that?), they don't go out of their way to advertise the warnings that appear in fine print in the ads as well as on the backs of the boxes. That's up to the consumer to notice. Caveat emptor! The box has directions for safe use, and warnings against unsafe use. Use Only As Directed. . . sound familiar? I wonder how many of you have even noticed the little warning on those packages stating Not To Be Used As A Sleep Substitute?

I speak here only as someone pointing out the obvious. I freely admit my guilt in disregarding warnings and directions for use on products like that one. Years ago, I would often stay up partying all night, then take a handful of caffeine and epinephrine pills and go to work operating heavy machinery. I have gone on 48-hour caffeine jags for various reasons (not all of them good). I too have felt the fluttery heartbeat and had that sense of spiderwebs in my hair. I have been so wired out on nothing stronger than coffee and sleep deprivation that I could not speak coherently or drive a car.

But whose fault was that? Should I threaten to boycott any television network that allows coffee, soft drink or tea ads to run? Or should I call up Juan Valdez directly and tell him he needs to shut down because his hand-picked Colombian beans made me see spots before my eyes after 20 cups and a day and a half without sleep? I could go militant and start fire bombing cola bottling plants.

The fault though, rests with the abuser. It is only common sense after all, that when you artificially alter the way your system naturally runs you are tinkering with a mechanism that even modern science does not fully understand. Every time you take so much as an aspirin, you are making changes in that system. When you start fooling with the body's need for sleep, you are really getting into some complex changes.

But there are those times you may honestly have to do something to keep your eyes open a couple of extra hours. A purist might suggest turning on a fan, or going outside for some fresh air. Personally, I have no problem with resorting to a couple of cups of coffee, or even a couple of caffeine pills. You have to do what you have to do. Remember though, that the fine print on the back of that package of stimulants is based on strenuous research into what dosages are safest for most average consumers. If you choose to ignore those warnings. . . it was your choice. Don't blame the results on the company that makes the substance, don't blame the folks who market it, and don't blame the carrier who distributed the advertising.

Women, Teach Your Men The Art of Laundry

I have here a letter from Alison Schuler of Albuquerque, N.M. (motto: "The City That Is Probably Spelled Wrong"). Ms. Schuler is concerned about the issue of How Guys Do Laundry. She relates the following anecdote:

"My husband announced one morning that he had discovered the previous night, on the eve of a two-day business trip, that he was out of underwear. Why he told me I do not know. I never tell him when I'm out of underwear. Anyway, he decided to remedy the situation in true guy fashion, by washing exactly three sets of underwear, thus disregarding the bulging hamper full of the rest of his underwear, which, presumably, would wash itself during his absence."

Ms. Schuler's letter serves to remind us of the importance of not engaging in sexist stereotyping. We must never make blanket gender-based statements such as: "Men always hog the blanket." Just because Ms. Schuler's husband doesn't do the laundry, that doesn't mean that there aren't millions upon millions of males who DO do the laundry, then hang it out to dry under the three suns of the Planet Xoomar, where they live. Most males do on Earth, however, do not do any more laundry than they absolutely have to. A single-sock load would not be out of the question, for a guy might well choose to wash ONLY THE REALLY DIRTY PART OF THE SOCK.

At first glance, this behavior might seem to be reprehensible, but in fact there's a simple, logical explanation for it: Men are worthless scum.

No, seriously, the explanation is that many men are AFRAID to do laundry, especially laundry belonging to people of other genders, because they (the males) might get into Big Trouble. I know I would. In our household we have a lot of sensitive garments with laundering-instruction tags full of strict instructions like:

DO NOT MACHINE-WASH. DO NOT USE BLEACH. DO NOT USE HOT WATER. DO NOT USE WARM WATER. DO NOT USE ANY WATER. DO NOT TOUCH THIS GARMENT WITHOUT SURGICAL GLOVES. PUT THIS GARMENT DOWN IMMEDIATELY. YOU CLUMSY OAF.

I'm intimidated by these instructions. I developed my laundering skills in college, where I used what laundry scientists call the Pile System, wherein you put your dirty underbunks on the floor until they form a waist-high pile, thus subjecting the bottom sheets to intense heat and pressure that causes them to become, over several months, clean enough to wear if you're desperate and spray them with Right Guard brand deodorant.

As a married person, I use the Hamper System, which is similar to the Pile System except that the clothes really do get clean, thanks to magical hamper rays.

No, I of course realize that hamperized clothes are cleaned by a person such as my wife, Beth, or Alison Schuler of Albuquerque, N.M. But I also know that Beth follows a complex procedure involving sorting and pre-soaking and 27 different combinations of water temperatures and chemical compounds such as fabric softener, stain remover, fabric hardener, cream rinse, plutonium, etc. Beth wouldn't LET me do her laundry unless I underwent years of training, because she assumes I'd screw up and cause our garments to shrink down to cute little Tinkerbell clothes, or transmaterialize in the dryer, similar to what happened to that unfortunate man in the movie "The Fly," so we'd wind up with, for example, a brassiere that had pant legs.

Beth's reluctance to let me near the laundry is typical of the vast majority of American women, according to a nationwide survey of several other women I know. A typical reaction came from my research department, Judi Smith, who gave the following statement regarding her husband, Tim, a Ph.D. college professor:

"I don't trust him to do my laundry at ALL, unless I've sorted it first and given him strict instructions before each and every load, because otherwise everything we own would be mauve or gray. . . He puts his clothes away damp. He can't put away anyone else's clothes, because he can't fold. I mean, the man can't fold a TOWEL for God's sake. Somehow, he can't get the corners to match up. A HAND towel, even."

I repeated Judi's statement to Beth, who emitted the bitter humorless laugh of a woman who has more than once watched her husband turn a basic shirt into a prize-winning origami project.

I'm not defending men here. I'm just saying that a lot of us view ourselves as laundry-impaired, and we'll probably continue to do so as long as women roll their eyes and shove us away from the washing machine when we're about to, for example, wash our delicate silks in the same load as our boater cover. So I'm saying to women: Teach us to launder. We are willing to learn, really, just as soon as the playoffs are over. Give us a chance to show what we are capable of. And definitely buy stock in whatever company makes Right Guard.

Become Aware Of Life's Gifts Each Day

an accident where we might be an innocent victim or unpleasant occurrences to which we contribute by the abuse of alcohol or sexual activity or whatever, it seems so easy to ignore life destructive possibilities as we plan our days and weeks.

This is one place where age serves one well. With enough experiences in life under our belt, it is easier to become aware of the gifts of each day and each opportunity to interact with persons for whom we care in depth. I just wish I knew a simple way to teach everyone that there is no greater gift than this day and that life is enriched more by depth of experience than by breadth. A lot of us have very full calendars and are quite busy. But if we take the time to reflect on what it is that makes life feel good to us, I bet our values are rooted in brief times of deep connection with someone with whom we love or loves us, with God, with a flash of natural beauty that touches the very center of our being.

If there is a process that can lead to a sense of being deeply grounded in values that can become increasingly clear and inform our daily choices, I would guess that such a process is rooted in intentional reflection either through a regular discipline of solitude and quiet or by allowing times of quietness following events that somehow grab us and shake and stir us. It doesn't always have to be grief.

Reflection can follow simple things like a really nice evening with a friend or an insight that grabs our mind in a class or the appreciation of something beautiful. I believe that our lives can be incredibly enriched by reflection, by thinking about and feeling about and being grateful about all sorts of events that touch us each day. But such reflections begin with the choice that we must consciously make to seek more depth in the living of our daily lives. I demand determination not to let life pass by with our being unaware of how we have been touched.

My encounter with the Moores was brief and intense. I will probably never see them again and whatever I may have done, I know that my life is better for their allowing me to share their grief. I am richer for it, not just because I know that it happened, but because I felt their pain and loss to the point that it became mine.

So I pick up this week and go on, but the eyes of my heart are wide open, looking for whatever gift lies out there this day for me.

The Mad Monk, a weekend home for many college students, was destroyed by fire late last semester.

Mourning The Loss Of A Loved One

BY SHANNON DAVIS
Entertainment Writer

1991. What a year! Did it really happen? Did all the traumatic disease, death and destruction actually take place? Was there a war in the Gulf? Was it necessary for Judge Thomas and Anita Hill's relationship to be symbolized by something on a coke can? Did Dr. Scuss really die? What happened to Gorbachev? Did I really make an "F" in Logic? But most importantly, did the Mad Monk really burn down?

Over Christmas Break I was having M.W.S. (Monk Withdrawal Syndrome), shuttering at the thought of the loss of such a "dear friend." I tried to convince myself it didn't really happen, that maybe it had been just a bad episode of The Twilight Zone. But when I returned to Wilmington and drove by "old faithful", I knew that it was very much a reality.

"Where will we go?" What will we do? were questions I heard the zoned-out followers ask in desperation after the accident. A few tried to get out and go to other bars only to have such bad "Monk flashbacks" that they became hermits for weeks.

It was just a given that UNCW's entertainment on Thursday nights was at the Mad Monk. You could even go there solo because you knew all your friends would be there. Now that there is no "real bar" to go to on Thursday nights you never get to see your party acquaintances. This is most definitely a social dilemma.

There is one bar in Wilmington that can stand up to comparison. Trust me, I wouldn't lead you astray. This club has brought just as many bands and can be just as much fun. I think you know where I'm speaking of, the sanctuary downtown — Jacob's Run.

We'll always have fond memories of the Mad Monk, but the mourning period is over it's time to get on with our social calendar.

Golden Globes Given Out

BY RAMONA HUPP
Arts & Entertainment Editor

Bugsy and The Beast went home the big winners at the Hollywood Foreign Press Association's 49th Golden Globe Awards last Saturday.

Beauty and the Beast, an animated version of the classic tale released by Disney, was the only film to garner three wins, an astonishing feat for an animated film.

The fact that Beauty and the Beast won three awards assures a nod for Oscar consideration. In fact, the Golden Globes has long been a fore-runner for predicting just who will walk off with the Academy Awards come March. Here are a list of Saturday night's winners.

In the Television Category:

Best TV Series — Drama: Northern Exposure
Best TV Series — Comedy: Brooklyn Bridge
Best TV Actress — Comedy: Candice Bergen (Murphy Brown)

Best TV Actress — Drama: Angela Lansbury (Murder, She Wrote)

Best TV Supporting Actress — Drama: Amanda Donohoe (L.A. Law)

Best TV Actor — Comedy: Burt Reynolds (Evening Shade)

Best TV Actor — Drama: Scott Bakula (Quantum Leap)

In the Film Category:

Best Film — Drama: Bugsy

Best Film — Musical/Comedy: Beauty and the Beast

Best Director — Oliver Stone (UFK)

Best Actress — Drama: Jodie Foster (Silence of the Lambs)

Best Supporting Actress — Comedy: Mercedes Ruehl (The Fisher King)

Best Actor — Drama: Nick Nolte (Prince of Tides)

Best Actress — Comedy: Bette Midler (For The Boys)

Best Actor — Comedy: Robin Williams (The Fisher King)

Best Supporting Actor — Comedy: Jack Palance (City Slickers)

New Video Releases

JUNGLE FEVER— This film once again proves Lee's willingness to explore the taboo and take audiences along for the bumpy ride. Wesley Snipes stars in another thought-provoking Spike Lee joint.

POINT BREAK— Keanu Reeves infiltrates a band of bank-robbing surfers. Patrick Swayze and Gary Busey also star in this film directed by Kathryn Bigelow.

REGARDING HENRY— Harrison Ford plays a ruthless lawyer who finds himself in the wrong place at the wrong time and is shot during a robbery. The story follows his slow rehabilitation and realization of life. Annette Bening plays his faithful mate.

"QUOTE OF THE WEEK"

Don't Wait For Black Robe To Come To Your VCR

BY ZACHARY BISACKY
Movie Reviewer

Moviegoing has undoubtedly become less popular with the invention of the VCR. Due to the ever-growing admission and refreshment charges, VCRs have easily persuaded viewers to wait for their preferred films to arrive on video. More importantly, most of the recent movies are only worth a 6 x 9 TV set, so the recent decline is logical. However, there are (believe it or not) still some features that can't be viewed anywhere but on the big screen in order to have a fully rewarding effect. Films like 2001 and APOCALYPSE NOW, for example, would seem blasphemous on a small screen. So would BLACK ROBE, a new release that has also made its way into this genre.

BLACK ROBE, probably one of the most obscure titles to be seen on the Carmike Cinema's roster in decades, is a remarkable find in Wilmington's bin of practically all-commercial features. It gives us a refreshing culture-clash drama that, for once, isn't between blacks and whites; instead it centers on North America Indians and a French Jesuit missionary in the early seventeenth century. Both colonies have strong spiritual traditions, making it extremely difficult for them to understand each other's religious practices.

The two main characters are Father Laforege (Lothaire Bluteau), an extremely pious young man determined to show the "savages" the way to God's paradise; and an Algonquian chief named Chomina (August Shellenburg), who's obstinate to the Father's dogmatic beliefs, which seem so impractical. The differences between the two are manifested when the chief and his tribe take the Father on a journey to find another colony of Indians.

Their adventure into the dangerous but beautiful wilderness of Quebec (via canoes) begins in early fall and takes them through the arctic Canadian winter. The picture moves quickly as we become anxious to see what lies further down the river for them physically and spiritually.

The cinematography, by Peter James, is very impressive; it actually pulls at your emotions and mixes perfectly with the spiritual search of the two dissimilar types. Shot on location in Quebec, it captures the essence of Northern Canada in its changing seasons, and, at the same time, pulls us in passionately to this almost forgotten era.

One glance at the other features which will be opening the new year (ALIENS 3, HOME ALONE II, and another BATMAN) presents a depressing prognosis; it's the same old cinematic garbage being recycled. Because the themes and content are expected in these features, it's no surprise that video rentals continue to escalate. BLACK ROBE challenges these discouraging sequels with something fresh and unusual. It's a beautiful film fit only for the powerful sound and sight that the theater may provide a "true" movie-goer with.

Mr. PotatoHead Will Appear at Jacob's Run Friday night.

Cinematique Brings Avant-Garde Films To College Road Cinemas

BY RAMONA HUPP
Arts & Entertainment Editor

What do BARTON FINK and THE COMMITMENTS have in common? They are two not-so-mainstream films that came to Wilmington theaters and promptly left. (I suppose we are to feel lucky that they ever came at all.)

It happens so often in the oh-so-mainstream suburbs. We cannot choose what we see on the big screen: we can only pick from what has been chosen for us, which is, what Zak Bisacky eloquently referred to as the "same old recycled cinematic garbage."

The group Cinematique is hoping to change all that. Cinematique will give you a second (or first chance in some cases) to see avant-garde films on the big screen. Striving to bring Wilmington audiences classic, foreign and limited-release films is the group's main purpose.

This will be the second season that the group will be operating in the Wilmington area. You may recall the group showing CITIZEN KANE and CYRANO DE BERGERAC last year. Unfortunately, the showings did not generate the audience anticipated, putting this year's run of films in jeopardy. Cinematique is hoping this season will be different. The films will be shown every other week on Sunday at 4:00 p.m. and again at 7:30 p.m. on Monday and Tuesday evenings at College Road Cinemas.

The films showing this season include: EUROPA, EUROPA (German-Polish 1991) Cited by some critics as one of the top ten films last year, this film centers on a young Polish-Jew who poses as a Nazi in World War II in order to survive. Feb. 2-4.

PROSPERO'S BOOKS (British 1991) You may recall we ran a review of this movie, based on Shakespeare's The Tempest, last semester, which stated that there was so much nakedness in this film that after awhile you didn't notice it. The film's director, Peter Greenaway, is the same man who brought the bafflingly elusive film THE COOK, THE THEIF, HIS WIFE AND HER LOVER. Feb. 16-18.

TATIE DANIELLE (French 1991) A dark comedy centered around a lady who is described as "Miss Daisy's demon twin." May 1-3

TRULY MADLY, DEEPLY (British 1991) Alan Rickman, "Mr. Nasty" in ROBIN HOOD, PRINCE OF THIEVES, and DIE HARD falls truly, madly and deeply in love with Juliet Stevenson. March 15-17.

THE MIRACLE (Irish 1991) This movie, filmed on the beautiful coast of Ireland, brings an American woman, played by Beverly D'Angelo (Chevy Chase's wife in the National Lampoon's Vacation movies) into the lives of a young boy and girl. March 29-31.

ANGEL AT MY TABLE (New Zealand 1991) Director Jane Campion takes us through the sometimes painful life and times of author Janet Frame in three different stages. This film has won raves around the world. April 12-14.

LAWRENCE OF ARABIA (British, 1962) Visually, this movie is a stunner and the big screen is the only way this sweeping major motion picture should be seen. Peter O'Toole, Anthony Quinn and Alec Guinness star in this 1989 re-stored version with many previously cut scenes. April 26-28.

DID YOU CARE?

Study Abroad With NSE

BY JENNY NEAL
Staff Writer

Do you enjoy attending UNCW but wish you could study desert biology at a campus in the southwest or architecture at a campus in the Caribbean? Well, now you can through the National Student Exchange program.

"The National Student Exchange allows UNCW students to take advantage of courses not ordinarily taught on our campus. UNCW students pay the same tuition that they pay here when they attend the other campuses. In addition, the number of credit hours earned is transferred back to UNCW. GPA, however is not transferred," Frank Tascone, student activities director said.

Generally, participation in the program is for a semester or one year. 107 colleges and universities in the U.S. are participating in the NSE, therefore, students participating in the exchange program are expected to be on the UNCW campus in the fall.

"Our Marine Biology program at UNCW's campus is very attractive to many students nationwide, therefore we expect to be a popular choice among National Student Exchange participants," Tascone said.

The application deadline for the program is Feb. 14, 1992 for consideration in the fall of 1992. There will be a $65 fee. Information about the program is available in the University Center lobby every Thursday, from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m.

"The student must have a 2.5 (GPA) to participate. Also, the student should select a school which will benefit their overall goals. It should be a choice which will enhance their learning experiences," Tascone said.

For further information, contact Frank Tascone at the Student Activities Office in the University Union, room 202.

JULIA, FROM COVER TO COVER TO COVER

She's everywhere! She's everywhere! The face of 1991 really was Julia Roberts, judging from the small mountain of magazine covers last year featuring the "Pretty Woman" star, what with her called-off wedding to Kiefer Sutherland and all that "Hook" hoopla. (So what if she also topped Mr. Blackwell's worst-dressed list for 1991?) Advertising Age reports the rest of the field in the face race, in descending order: Michael Landon, Kevin Costner, Delta Burke, Oprah Winfrey, Jodie Foster, President Bush, Nancy Reagan and Elizabeth Taylor.

THREE WORDS:
LOCATION, LOCATION, LOCATION

Misery? Kathy Bates knows all about it. The actress spent four months in Brazil's Amazon jungle shooting "At Play in the Fields of the Lord," a trip that left her anything but a happy camper.

"It's hot and sweaty, and there are bugs, and you want to go home, and it's day 1 of 120. You're at the Amazon. It ain't Rio," Bates told People magazine.

No such jungle fever bothered co-star Daryl Hannah, however. "She loves being outside, the jungle, the animals," Bates said. "You could turn around and see Daryl with her lip being gnawed on by this strange little monkey, and she just loved it."

MORE JUNGLE-JANGLED NERVES

Sean Connery, meanwhile, had his own moviemaking problems in Catemaco, Mexico, a jungle location that left a bit to be desired in the way of, you know, civilization. The heat and the humidity (98 percent) helped make for an arduous shoot on "Medicine Man," a rain-forest love story starring Connery and Lorraine Bracco.

Connery, back home in Spain, told Premiere magazine: "Well, the food was appalling. ... You couldn't go to the restaurants. Everybody got sick. I wasn't sick only because I drank too much vodka. And there was nowhere to go. ... We didn't even have a cinema. We had a tennis court, which was like the beach at Dunkirk. ... You couldn't swim in the water — you wouldn't swim to. You couldn't eat in the town — you wouldn't want to."

According to crew members, Connery's cinematic descent into the heart of darkness registered high on the grouch meter. The star high-tailed it out there three days ahead of schedule, forcing the sweat-soaked crew to work double shifts.

A crew member huffed: "Sure, it's 90 to 100 degrees and there are mosquitoes and he's 80 feet up in a tree doing stunts, but he's making a million dollars a week. It's hot for everybody."

QUOTE-UNQUOTE

"Maybe I should drop dead — it would be a good career move. Look what it did for Glenn Miller." —retired clarinetist and bandleader Artie Shaw, 81, on the release of his last recordings, circa 1954, quoted in Newsweek magazine.

— "Let's face it, everyone is the one person on Earth you shouldn't get involved with." —writer-director Nora Ephron (author of "Hearburn"), quoted in Time magazine.

"If you take it to its ultimate fruition, music — like all art — is a magical thing. We've stuck it out for so many years that we've managed to actually start to get to the crux of that. That's what the band comes to the shows for and that's what the Deadheads come to the shows for. Everybody wants to be transmogrified a bit into a somewhat lighter, higher being.

We abandon reason; we try to supercede reason on a nightly basis." —rocker Bob Weir of the Grateful Dead, explaining the band's eternal appeal, in the February issue of M magazine.

ANOTHER YEAR OLDER

Wednesday's birthdays: actress Piper Laurie, 60 ... actor Bill Bixby, 58 ... author Joseph Wambaugh, 55 ... actor John Hurt, 52 ... actress Linda Blair, 33 ... rapper D.J. Jazzy Jeff, 27.

Did You Hear What I Heard?

Were you there? Did you hear?
 Where were you Monday night from 7:30 p.m. to 10:20 p.m?
 Eating dinner? At the movies? Washing your laundry?

Where were you when UNC-Wilmington battled American University for three hours and three overtimes?

Three hours?
 Three overtimes?
 Where did you party on a night when two Colonial Athletic Conference teams bashed each other's brains in for 55 minutes and 205 offensive points?

55 minutes? 205 points?
 Where you should have been was glued to a radio for this was the best game this season.

I admit it. I didn't plan to listen to the men's game that night. I had other things to do, in fact I watched the women's home contest against American for most of the night. I was, however updated to the men's score by the public address announcer during breaks.

The Seahawks were up. (22-10).

The Seahawks were down. (34-30).

UNCW took a five point lead. (42-37).

UNCW lost a five point lead. (42-42).

The game went back and forth and little by little I became less interested in the contest in front of me.

After the home match, I think we lost.

I tuned in the battle in Bender on my car and for the next 45 minutes my world consisted of that little electronic box in my car screaming the play-by-play action.

Matt Fish nailed a five-foot jumper in the key as I stopped at the light in front of Hardees. It was 68-66 with 5:20 remaining in the contest.

There was a mad scramble under the AU net as I flew by Blockbuster Video at 55 mph. The static in my right speaker garbled the action temporarily.

I readjusted the frequency settings and a foul was called. Seahawk Korny Aldrich went to the line and made one of two. It was 69-66 with 4:18 left.

I swung into the Wilson's grocery store parking lot as AU Brian Gilgeous came a shot off the backboard. It was 69-68 with 4:01 to go.

I turned the engine and lights off but not the radio. The voices in the box wouldn't let me leave.

A Fish basket and two free-throws by AU's Erick Grace pushed the score to 70-71 with 1:26 to go. I begin to shiver in the cold car with the heater turned off.

A Fish dunk and two missed free-throws gave American the ball, down 73-70, with 39 left.

A guy getting into his parked car next to me tapped my window. I rolled it down. "You listening to the game?", he asked.

"Ya," I grunted not taking my eyes off the radio dial.

"Who's winning?", he asked.

"Hawks by three," I mumbled.

We listened to the final seconds together. After a time-out the Eagles worked the ball to Gilgeous in the corner. He planted his feet behind the trey line. He shot and.... missed!

Twocek!

Fish was called for a foul and Gilgeous went to the free-throw line for three shots with 17 ticks left.

Swish!

Swish!

The sound tells it all. We go to O.T.

I rushed through the market during the commercial, and then home. My car groaned as it hit each of my apartment's speed bumps at full speed.

I lunged for the radio next to my bed. I tuned in again to hear Eagle Erick Grace tie the game again at 83. A scoreless minute later we were in double O.T.

A radio, by now, had been turned on in every room (kitchen, bath, closet). No matter where I was in my new pad, I heard the action.

I searched the refrigerator for leftovers. Four and half minutes, three chicken drumsticks, two time-outs, and one less UNCW player (Fish fouled out in second) later, the game remained deadlocked and forced period three.

The players were exhausted. The coaches were too. My heart and stomach weren't feeling to swift either.

The drama again built for a third and last time. Nerves were frayed. Body muscles were sore. Something had to give.

Veney attacked the lane with six seconds remaining, UNCW down one. He became entangled with AU's Donald Grant. Both went to the floor. Fans were screaming. Players were shouting. Coaches were jumping up and down, but the referees remained silent.

A mad scramble for the ball ensued. Eagles got it. They won. They survived, 98-97.

Oh, were you there? Oh, Did you hear?

Seahawk Leaves Basketball

BY PATRICK FOWLER
Sports Editor

For an athlete, it is never easy to walk away from the game.

Years of hard work, fierce competition, and team camaraderie is something an athlete does not toss away easily. It is a decision he or she takes privately and seriously, but for UNC-Wilmington junior forward Andrew Harding it was the final solution to his athletic frustrations of the past two seasons.

The 6'7" junior left the Seahawk men's basketball program after UNCW's 74-55 loss to George Mason Saturday.

"At this point in my life, my career is over," Harding said from his campus apartment building Sunday. "I've put a lot of time and energy into coming back from my injury, but I haven't reached my potentials as an athlete."

"I know I should have. It has been very frustrating for me as a player. This was not an easy decision for me. It was one the hardest things I've had to do."

Harding, who underwent reconstructive knee surgery only 15 months ago, played only six games and 30 minutes in a Seahawk uniform.

"He's just a frustrated guy," UNCW head coach Kevin Eastman said after the loss to GMU. "There are things he wants to do but just can't. People have absolutely no idea how difficult, how painful, and how frustrating it is for a player who tries as hard as he can, yet can't do what he was capable of before the injury."

Harding, before transferring to UNCW last season, played two seasons at Army where he averaged 7.4 points and 3.8 rebounds per game.

The talented forward was named to the Military Academy Athletic Conference's All-Rookie his first season with the Cadets. Harding was also part of the '86 North Carolina 3-A high school state championship team. That year he averaged 19 points and 8 rebounds per game.

Harding cited his speed and jumping ability as his primary reasons for leaving the team. The junior stated his play had deteriorated as a result of the injury and caused him to be a liability on defense. This was a position he once took pride in excelling in.

"At this point in my life my career is over. I've put a lot of time and energy to come back from my injury but I haven't reached my full potential. I haven't even reached the athlete I was two years ago."

Andrew Harding

"I used to be able to dunk and guard point guards off the dribble," Harding said, "but now I am much slower out there and I can't do it. That missing ability really bothers me."

The loss of Harding is a big one for UNCW, for the Seahawks have no one to back-up reserve senior forward Byron Withers.

Freshman John Spann, who has been rotating the starting position with senior Kenneth Aldrich and junior Tim Shaw, sprained his foot in the GMU contest and will be sidelined indefinitely.

"When we took the second group out against Mason, John sat down and took off his shoes," Eastman said. "He had some discomfort. It was about the size of a golf ball."

Meanwhile Harding plans to remain at the university and work on obtaining his degree in finance.

"When I make a decision, I make it and I don't look back," Harding said. "Now it is time for the student in me to go full speed ahead."

The junior will keep his scholarship this year in accordance with NCAA's collegiate athletic by-laws that prevent a scholarship from being taken away once given. Next season however may be a different story.

UNCW athletic director Paul Miller, when questioned, stated he couldn't make a decision about Harding's future until all the facts were known.

The junior still recalls some of his favorite times on the court.

"I would have to say the state championship in high school was big," Harding said. "In college, I would remember guarding Lionel Simmons with Army in his final home game. I guarded him well and scored 18 points."

Simmons played for La Salle University and was known for his closeness with deceased Loyola-Marymount star Hank Gathers.

"I had hoped to be more of an impact player," Harding said. "I'm disappointed that the people in the area didn't see me perform to my capabilities."

'Hawks Fall To AU In Three Overtimes

BY PATRICK FOWLER
Sports Editor

UNCW-Wilmington finally played what they said they needed to, to win, a full 40 minutes.

They got that Monday night and 15 minutes more of intense competition, but it still wasn't enough to bring the Seahawks their first win in conference play. UNCW fell short to American University, 98-97, in triple overtime.

"I'm not sure our kids can come back Saturday and Monday," Eastman said after the loss. "I think they are emotionally spent from the toughest stretch of games, as a coach, that I've ever been in at any level."

Eastman, who was critical of the officiating crew all evening attempted to chase down ACC official Lenny Wirtz after the game to discuss Wirtz's no-call in the final six seconds of the third overtime. The call or no-call involved junior point guard Reggie Veney and American Donald Grant. Both players became entangled when Veney was driving to the basket with UNCW down one. Both players crashed to the floor because of the contact.

Hearing no whistle, Grant grabbed the loose ball and shoveled to a near-by teammate who threw the ball into the front court, running out the clock.

"This game was stolen from us," Eastman said in the WAAP radio broadcast after the game. "The problem is we don't get any respect in this league. We'll spend the $2.50 to call the league head of officials but it won't change anything."

The controversial ending marred a dramatic contest as two struggling programs went headlong at each other for almost three hours.

UNCW (6-9 overall, and 0-4 in conference play) threatened to blow the game open early, racing out to a 22-10 lead in the first quarter.

However, following an American time-out, Eagle coach Chris Knoche placed Craig Sedmak back into the line-up despite his two fouls. Sedmak and the Eagles stormed back to tie it at 24 all on a 14-2 run.

A 10-6 run in the final two minutes gave American a 34-30 halftime lead.

The second half saw more streaks by both teams with neither club gaining a double digit advantage. The Seahawks led by three late, 73-70, when Matt Fish fouled American Brian Gilgeous with 17 seconds left as he was attempting a 22-foot three-pointer.

Gilgeous made all three foul shots sending the game into the first overtime period.

The second overtime was forced when Eagle Erick Grace canned two foul shots knotting the game at 83.

UNCW's Mark Eaton forced the third five minute period connecting on a running jumper with 11 seconds remaining, tying the contest yet again at 91.

Gilgeous was the game high scorer with 23 points.

Eagles Bomb 'Hawks

Assistant Sports Editor

The Lady Seahawks played their best back-to-back games of the season over the weekend, but it wasn't enough.

"Until we rebound," coach Sheri Tynes said after Monday's loss to American University 72-62, "we won't win."

UNCW (0-4 in the Colonial Athletic Association and 0-13 overall), led by Pat Martin's career-high 19 points, seven rebounds, and four steals, couldn't keep AU's offense boxed out and that contributed heavily to the defeat. AU's offense outscored the UNCW defense 25-21.

After the game Tynes commented, "We matched up well with them height-wise. We just didn't execute."

Kim Bush finished with eight points, seven rebounds, six assists, and six steals. Zandra Harris added eleven points and Lorraine Cordaway rounded out the Seahawks in double-figures with ten.

Saturday, UNCW hosted George Mason

University in an afternoon tilt that typified their season. Though the final score had GMU winning 81-66, the game was closer than the score indicated.

The downfall, again, was the lack of rebounding. GMU finished with 46 rebounds, 20 of them offensive.

UNCW was only able to corral 20 defensive boards and 29 overall.

"They were beating us inside," Tynes said Saturday. "We played good defense, but we weren't able to capitalize."

Harris led the way against GMU with 17 points and five rebounds. Cordaway added 14 points, Myra Horton 11, and Martin 10.

After Monday's loss Tynes said her team had played their best back-to-back games of the year. She also added that in order to win, "We're going to have to play as a team and rebound," Tynes said.

The Lady Seahawks hope to rebound from these tough losses this weekend.

Saturday they will be in Williamsburg, VA, to take on William and Mary.

Buffalo has been impressive at times this season but losses to the Lions and the Chiefs have shown their weak spots in their defense line. "Skins 45, Bills 17."

Jim Clark

The Bills will return some respect, the AFC has lost over the decade. Jim "Machine Gun" Kelly and Thurman Thomas will lead the hurry-up offense that will not only strike early but often.

The Bills running game will open their passing attack and the Bills have more experience on artificial turf that will be found in the Hubert H. Humphrey Metrodome. "Bills, 34-21. Thomas will be the Super Bowl MVP."

The Redskins were tough during the season and they haven't slowed down in the play-offs. The Bills are much improved from last season so it will be close. "Skins, 35-28."

Westside Move Postponed Until Inspection

BY LAURA KEETER
Staff Writer

A $500,000 renovation on the old cafeteria is being done and the Student Health and Wellness Center will move as soon as the electrical, life-safety and total inspections are done. Project architect Robert W. Sawyer said that the life safety inspection, which tests the fire and smoke alarm systems, has been scheduled and the state agencies will do the other two inspections at the same time or soon after.

"Everybody has inspected that job so many times there will be no surprises," Sawyer said. "It should all come to a head next week."

Ballard McKim and Sawyer Architects, who worked on Wagoner Hall as well as other buildings on campus, should be able to "turn it over" to the university in a couple of weeks, Sawyer said.

William A. Bryan, vice chancellor for student affairs, said the process of moving should take two or three days. "The Student Health and Wellness Center is boxed up, ready to move and it is rather difficult for us right now to function and provide service that's needed because so much is in boxes."

Dr. Kathleen Jewell, of Student Health and Wellness said that during the move the Wellness Center will be closed, except for emergencies.

J. Carl Dempsey, associate vice chancellor for business affairs said that the reason for the delay (the Wellness Center had planned to move by Dec. 19) was that Recon Electrical Construction, the electrical contractor, declared bankruptcy and filed Chapter 11.

"The simple fact that the electrical contractor declared bankruptcy did it to us, and there wasn't anything we could do about it because the Chapter 11 protects him from anybody doing anything to him," he said.

Recon quit the job leaving electrical and life-safety work unfinished, Dempsey said. The bonding company which insured Recon took three weeks to find Harris Electric Company of Wilmington to finish the work within the budget, he said.

The Student Health and Wellness Center, the Student Development Center and LivWell will move into the second floor of Westside Hall, the new name for the building. The Division of Public Services will move from Hoggard 227 into the first floor.

After the Wellness Center moves, the bookstore will expand into the available space at Burney Student Support Center, Dempsey said.

"Most of it is bookstore expansion that was planned when the bookstore was built, for that area to be included in the bookstore."

Alternatives will expand into the available space at the University Union once LivWell moves, Brynn said.

The name of Westside Hall is only temporary, until another name is chosen, Bryan said.

The Wellness Center may have a pharmacy as well as some additional staff. Additional staff will be possible if a student fee increase of $11 for the year is approved, Bryan added.

SGA Rejects Having Two-Party Ballot System

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

The Election Board of the Student Government Association voted down a proposal to begin a ticket ballot.

A ticket ballot is a system in which the presidential candidate picks his running mate for vice president. The candidates run for office and campaign together on one ticket. "An example is President Bush and Dan Quayle," said Shasta McAllister, election board chairman.

McAllister and her board discussed the topic for three weeks and McAllister presented the idea to the SGA Senate before the board voted on it. She said that a few of the senators that she talked to were for the idea. One senator said that the idea would promote a better working relationship between the student body president and the vice president. "Most of the senators were against the idea. They felt that the students had the right to choose and that that would take it away. I also talked to some students about it too and they didn't like it."

The ticket ballot is a system in which the presidential candidate pick his running mate.

"We discussed the pros and cons and the cons outweighed the positive," she said.

To compare systems, McAllister talked to the election board at the University of North Carolina at Greensboro. She said that the only difference in the two systems was that they picked their attorney general.

The rights of the students as well as the option offered to students were discussed by the board as the decision was being made. "We were afraid that students might be tempted not to vote if they did not like one of the two candidates on the ticket. They may be tempted not to vote for the president if they did not like the vice president," McAllister said.

McAllister said that the system "could happen in the future. Not the next two years though. It depends on SGA as a whole."

The proposal was made by a member of the executive board of the SGA.

Court Order Rape Suspect Tested For AIDS

BY ROGER CHESLEY
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

DETROIT — Attorney David Piontkowsky says what happened to rape suspect Dwayne Peterson was unforgivable.

Detroit Police Cmdr. Robert Hislop says what could have happened to 10 alleged rape victims was unspeakable.

The disclosure last week that Peterson had been tested by court order and found to be carrying the AIDS virus was either a blatant violation of Michigan law or a public service.

It just depends on who's talking.

"For a police officer to disclose the test result to the public is clearly a violation, if not of the letter, certainly of the spirit of the law," Piontkowsky, who teaches a course on AIDS legal issues at the University of Michigan, said Tuesday.

Hislop said: "It's a tragedy. ... I think we have an obligation" to inform the public.

A 25-year-old Detroit woman who reported she was raped recently tested positive for the human-immunodeficiency virus (HIV), which causes AIDS.

Peterson was charged last week in four rapes, including that of the Detroit woman, and police say he is a suspect in as many as six other rapes and 100 burglaries in northwest Detroit.

Those cases are not likely to be affected by any dispute involving the AIDS test because the test results are not expected to be used as evidence, police said. A 36th District Court judge will decide Thursday whether Peterson is to stand trial on the rape charges as well as earlier charges of attempted rape and attempted murder.

For a police officer to disclose the test result to the public is clearly a violation.

Peterson's defense attorney, Sequoia DuBose, wouldn't say whether he'll file a lawsuit against the Detroit Police Department for releasing the test information.

But cast in the new light of the AIDS epidemic, an age-old dispute is festering over whose rights matter more — the victim's or the suspect's — when they seem to conflict.

Attorney Piontkowsky said a 1989 state law on HIV testing calls for "as narrow a disclosure as possible. It's clearly being violated" in the Peterson case, he said.

"If this had been done properly, an HIV test would've been ordered, after a lot of discussion and debate, and released to the people who need it," such as the alleged rape victims, said Piontkowsky.

There "would have been a general discussion in the media, without his name being released."

DuBose agreed, saying Detroit police had an obligation to protect the test results. But he stressed that he didn't want to "appear insensitive about certain victims."

"Our No. 1 issue right now is that anyone who had sexual contact with him gets tested," Dr. Bose said Tuesday.

Inspector Michael Falvo, the police department's legal adviser, defended the department's decision to release Peterson's HIV test results.

Partly because as few as 10 percent of actual rapes are believed to be reported, "We felt that there was a compelling need in this particular circumstance to have the dissemination of this information to the public," Falvo said.

But DuBose and Piontkowsky challenged the decision to seek the blood search warrant. AIDS testing of rape convicts is mandatory in Michigan, but there is no law on the testing of suspects. When Peterson's blood was drawn on Jan. 22, he had not yet been charged with the Detroit woman's rape.

DuBose called the blood test a violation of Peterson's right to privacy.

That rankled 36th District Magistrate Irma Chenevert, who signed the warrant on Jan. 21 allowing the blood test.

"The warrant had more on it than just testing for HIV," Chenevert said Tuesday. "It included further evidence for ongoing cases."

Craig Covey, president of the Midwest AIDS Prevention Project, voiced an opinion repeated by many concerned about the legal events surrounding this case.

"Our justice system says you're innocent until proven guilty," Covey said Tuesday. "I don't want to comment on whether he's suffered any in this situation. But my sympathy goes to the victim of the rape."

Maimone, Moore Are Promoted

BY JENNIFER WILSON
Staff Writer

Charles Maimone and Towana Moore received new job titles and responsibilities early this year after Margaret Taylor-Robison moved from director of auxiliary services to director of annual funds.

Moore, previously the coordinator of auxiliary services, was in charge of parking, student identification cards, vending and recycling. Her title now is director of administrative services which includes her old duties plus new ones: the post office; the print shop and the warehouse.

Moore says that although some changes may be made under her direction, she does not want to rush into them without looking over her new duties carefully.

Maimone's job has changed from director of housing and food services to director of auxiliary services. Maimone has kept the responsibility of supervising housing and food services. The new job title has added the direction of the student bookstore and the all-campus debit card to his duties. Maimone plans to direct the renovation of the bookstore over the summer.

"The Health Service and Student Development will be moving out of the building. The space will be given back to the bookstore. With this space we will increase the size of the store and relocate the textbooks.

The all-campus debit card should be available Fall 1993. Students will have the option of putting money down to open an account which can be used on vending machines, washers and dryers, copiers and the bookstore. The debit card will also work at the food services if the student has purchased a meal plan. Security access to residence halls will also be provided through a sensor.

Maimone said that he will be able to give up some of the housing responsibilities in July so he can concentrate on his new duties.

"It's going to be a challenging busy year. It's an exciting opportunity for me," Maimone said.

Rotary Club Offers Scholarships

BY JENNY NEAL
Staff Writer

Rotary club scholarships are available to help finance students' education.

According to David Painter, chairman of the Rotary Scholarship Committee, a scholarship is awarded to one student a year.

The student must be a junior or a senior. The scholarship is for $1000. Students with a 3.0 and financial need are considered by our selection committee. We also consider the student's written statement expressing his or her reason for thinking they deserve the scholarship.

The Rotary Club also offers a Rotary Club International Scholarship to qualifying undergraduate or post-graduate students. Only two students are selected per Rotary district.

Herman Blizard of the Rotary Club in Wilmington said, "The Rotary International Scholarship is awarded by our selection committee to the student that we feel will be a good ambassador. While attending a foreign college or university, Rotary International pays full tuition for one academic year."

He added that the selected student is expected to represent Rotary International by making speeches and presentations at the Rotary Club in the foreign country where they will be attending school. "Knowledge of a foreign language is essential," he said.

Information about Rotary International scholarships are available by contacting the Rotary Club at 762-3313 or by contacting the Financial Aid office in James Hall, 395-3177.

Address Was A Disappointment

For weeks, President George Bush has been building suspense and expectations about the contents of his State of the Union address. He said that the cure for the nation's economic ailments would be revealed. The address fell well short of the mark.

Bush revealed his plans for some military spending cuts, and offered some small tax breaks to citizens, but no wide-sweeping solutions were offered.

He mentioned college students in a new tax plan. The proposal was to allow graduates to deduct interest paid on student loans from their income taxes. That might help some graduates, but a large number of young professionals right out of college will not be in a position to itemize on their tax forms. In other words, the tax advantage will be useless to them.

Health care was also an issue, and Bush proposed a new tax plan which would give tax credits worth $3700 to help families purchase health insurance. Unfortunately, most American families will have a hard time finding health insurance for that low price. And remember, that money is taken off of income tax; it is not given to the family up front. That means families who can't afford insurance premiums in the first place won't be any closer to having insurance because of the Bush program.

Bush's scolding tone to liberals in Congress seemed ironic when it came to the economy, as he (once again) called for a reduction in the capital gains tax. As Speaker of the House Thomas Foley said in the Democratic response to the address, Bush talked of the economy like someone else had been president for the last year and a half. In fact, Bush has little room to criticize after he spent the first year of this recession in denial, claiming the no recession existed.

He also "challenged" Congress to pass his economic package by March 20. This is hardly a reasonable request, considering that plan took the administration 18 months to put together. Congress will need some time to sift through it.

The president made a mistake in raising hopes for this address higher than he could have possibly met, but after hearing his half-hearted plans for the economy, the state of the union may be staying the same for a while.

Phillip Loughlin Problems Plague "State of the Union"

President Bush made his "State of the Union" address again Tuesday night. Personally, I was going to skip it. Who actually watches these things anyway? Come on! I mean, we're college students. Certainly we have more important things to do than to listen to the Great White Father tell us that, sure there are a few minor problems, but hey, he's running for re-election and he'll fix everything in the next four years.

Minor problems? Minor—as we've been in a recession so long, it's now being taught in economics classes as the U.S. economic strategy of the eighties and nineties. Minor—as in the American auto industry has stooped to blaming foreigners for their own inadequacies. (Did you see the Cadillac commercial where they used the World War Two newsreel footage of Japanese zeroes being shot down? I was ashamed.) Minor—as in thousands of Americans going without medical care because they can't afford the actual care (A semi-private room at North Carolina Memorial Hospital runs about $385 per day) or the insurance to cover it. Minor—as in... you get my point.

Well, maybe these problems aren't so minor. Never fear though, there is no doubt in my mind that ol' George will manage to gloss the seriousness of the situation over somehow. He'll point out some of his "successes", like the Drug War. Surely that one is going well. You need only watch prime-time TV for programs like American Detective or The Drug Cartel to see how well we're doing there. Oh yeah!

That's two major wars we've won since G.B. came into office. Oh, did you forget about the Gulf War? That's okay, so has almost everybody else. Besides, only a few minutes of viewing those tonight video tapes should convince us of the success of that one. Why look back? Unless of course you are concerned that Saddam Hussein has already rebuilt his elite Republican Guard. Or if it bothers you that he stymied the U.N. peacekeepers when they tried to get his nuclear weapons secret. Sure, they took some paperwork and said "bad boy!". But what ever happened with that anyway? So what that a crackpot Middle-Eastern psycho is probably well on the way to a nuclear arsenal? It's a minor thing.

And let's not forget that we finally won the Cold War. Most people don't realize the real reason it was so denominated. Those of us who were not around when it began were probably told that it was called "cold" because it never came to armed (hot) conflict between the two super powers. Wrong! In fact, the battle raged for over forty years. The weapons were not thermonuclear though, but economic. That's right, "COLD" cash. The battle plan was to see who could force the other to disintegrate under the weight of their staggering defense budget. First one to bust loses. Of course, this one may yet end up like one of those old Popeye cartoons, where he beats the daylight out of Brutus, and, even as Olive Oyl sings his praises, he collapses to the deck beside his nemesis.

So those are the "successes". What about the failures? Well, except for some round about hedging, and some proposals that no one is going to listen to, we probably didn't hear too much about those. After all, this is an election year.

I felt a little irresponsible about writing this without actually checking out what the Pres had to say, so I tuned in the speech on my radio. I missed the first ten or fifteen minutes, but the rest pretty much followed what I expected. I listened as he blustered and bleated about the importance of family and how we needed to make it stronger. I listened to him promote his "plan" for making the U.S. a world leader in education. I listened to him tell the congressmen and the audience that he wanted these things and others. Then I listened as he walked off to return to the golf courses where we have seen him so much during the last couple of years.

I listened to these things, but all I heard was an extended campaign speech. What I did not hear was a real report about the actual state of the Union. I gathered from his proposals though, that things are in pretty rough shape. Something else I think I heard, although this may have just been a little interference on the radio, was the mental snores of the congressmen he was addressing. And I can imagine the thoughts of those who were listening and watching the applause lights (according to NBC, Bush was interrupted 77 times by applause. Good God! They counted the applause?).

Many of the proposals Bush asked for movement on have been sitting in Congress for years without action. There is little doubt that most of them will continue to do the same. In the Chief's own words, even the aging process could be slowed if it had to go through Congress. The fact is, as I see it anyway, the whole point of this speech was to present some new campaign material, and to remind us of some of the older promises. I think it may also have served to remove some of the heat from his back by placing the charge before Congress. Only time will tell if any of these things are actually going to go through. If they don't though, we can rest assured that the blame will be laid at the door of the Democrats in Congress.

Well, that's about as close to political analysis as I will ever get. I don't think I heard anything definite about the recession ending. I'm sure he didn't blame the American auto workers for their own problems. And I'm still trying to decipher exactly what he said about health care, except it sounded like he wanted to install price controls and give people with low incomes a tax break to buy insurance. I'm sure that'll work just fine.

Phil Smith Commercials More Interesting Than Game

Well friends, it has been such a slow news week that I am really having trouble coming up with something to write about. It's too early for me to delve into the political world and provide insight for the 1992 presidential election. President Bush has been taking his Pepto Bismol and so there is no more intestinal flu to report on. I had considered writing a piece about eating homeless people, but it appears that others have beat me to it.

I guess I could write about the Super Bowl, but it was not all that impressive. The ball was turned over at least twenty-five times in the first three minutes. The Redskins made a touchdown but, upon further review by the officials, it was overturned because the receiver was wearing illegal underwear (or something like that).

I am a Redskins fan and I don't have anything against Buffalo except that it is in New York. But their quarterback, Jim Kelly, needs to find a safer occupation. After about the thirty-seventh time he was sacked, I noticed that he seemed ever so frustrated. His team was losing something like 107-3, and he was spending more time on his back than the ladies that work down on Dock St., all in front of millions of people around the world.

Speaking of millions of people watching the Super Bowl, I wonder just what some of those people were thinking as they watched. I'm sure the Japanese were watching attentively considering they plan to someday own the National Football League (as well as John Madden's screen chalkboard).

I also imagine that Oliver Stone was somewhere watching the game. I hear that he has a theory about how the Redskins scored their third touchdown. It appeared that the quarterback threw the ball to the receiver, who caught it and scored. But Mr. Stone believes the ball was thrown from a grassy knoll near the endzone. He says that it is some CIA/Communist plot and he plans to make a controversial movie out of it.

I assume that President Bush took time out of his busy schedule (It's not like he should have been writing the State of the Union Address or anything like that) to watch the Super Bowl. I imagine that he and "Bar" watched the game on the official White House (Sony) big-screen television. I can see him sitting there and saying, "Come on Rypien, don't drop that ball, wouldn't be prudent at this juncture; win this one for the jip...for the home team, for America, for all of those brave men and women fighting over on OPERATION DESERT STORM, for..."

"George," the first lady would reply, "That was during last year's Super Bowl when we were at war. This year we are in a depression, so tell Rypien to win this one for all of the homeless people out there watching the game through the windows of Macy's Department Store (Assuming Macy's is still in business)."

The most interesting thing about the Super Bowl was of course, the commercials. My favorite was the Pepsi ad with Cindy Crawford. Now that is a real nice can. Pepsi also announced a new slogan, "Gotta Have It." I'm thinking of adopting a similar one for my column ("Gotta Read It"). Until next time...keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

Brad Sekulich European Recognition Isn't Everything For Croatian People

During the last month, the struggle for independence and democracy in war-torn Croatia has taken many positive steps forward. Independent Croatia has been diplomatically recognized by the European Community as well as many nations from all over the world. The fighting has been almost non-existent since the Jan. 3rd cease fire took effect and now the people of Croatia are talking of rebuilding rather than surviving.

Of particular interest is the way in which Germany acted during the process of Croatian and Slovenian recognition. Germany, having watched attempt after attempt by the E.C. to keep Yugoslavia peacefully together failed dismally. They decided that the recognition of Croatia and Slovenia would be the best deterrent to continued Serbian aggression. This was not a decision endorsed by the entire E.C. and it threatened to split the community in its first real test of foreign policy. Germany stood fast by its decision to recognize and threatened to do so alone, if necessary.

"...the struggle is far from over, even though the fighting has stopped."

Not wanting to lose credibility on its first joint venture the E.C. capitulated and agreed to recognize Croatia and Slovenia on Jan. 15, providing they met certain requirements. Foremost, among these requirements was the guarantee of ethnic minorities rights, to be monitored by the E.C. These conditions were readily met and Croatia and Slovenia are now independent nations in the eyes of much of the world.

With firm and resolved action Germany has shown its willingness to take a leadership role within the European Community. This will be of particular interest to watch in the future, as the E.C. grows stronger and more influential in world politics.

Croatia has finally received the independence it has desired for centuries. But the struggle is far from over, even though the fighting has stopped for now. Almost one-third of Croatian territory is in Serbian hands and the Serbians have officially vowed not to relinquish so much as one square inch of conquered territory.

In addition to the spectra of further violence Croatia must also bear the burdens of democracy. Given the hesitancy of many nations, including the U.S. and Britain, to recognize Croatian independence, Croatia will be suspect to very close scrutiny in her trip down the democratic path.

One hopes that these observers bear in mind that Croatia certainly has made no claims to be a Utopia and will, like all democracies make mistakes.

Now, though, is a time to be glad. For both the advancements made by the democracies and most of all for the step in the destruction that has claimed as many as 10,000 lives.

Stillpoint With Bob Haywood The Path Of Life Is Painful, Hard

A teacher of mine once described two fundamental attitudes toward living our lives. He said that people are either spectators or participants, either sit on the balcony watching what goes on below like we sat and watched the Super Bowl on TV, or we get down into the middle of things like the participants in that game. That concept is echoed in the following quote from a rather inconsequential novel.

"It seems to me that you can be awfully happy in this life if you stand aside and watch and mind your own business, and let other people do as they like about damaging themselves and one another. You go on kidding yourself that you're impartial and tolerant and all that, then all of a sudden you realize you're dead and you've never been alive at all. Being alive hurts."

The truth that "being alive hurts" came strongly to my mind as I had the opportunity to hear student friends of mine sharing stories about their lives. In every case, without fail, there were stories of dealing with some struggle, no matter what age. And then, as my mind was following this thought, I remembered that in three beautiful films I have seen recently, "Prince of Tides", "Grand Canyon" and "Fried Green Tomatoes", the core of stories was built around people's struggles to deal with some very simple but very profound realities that led them into and through the insight that "being alive hurts."

Most of us want to avoid pain and do so when we can, but I think it is important to realize and accept the fact that pain in life is inevitable, it's a part of the very fabric of our personal and corporate existence. Somewhere we have gotten the notion that if we can get an education and get a good job, then we will have financial security. If we find the right person to love and marry, then we should be able to avoid a lot of pain and struggle. We will be able to rise above it, watch it on TV, but not have to participate in painful situations. Many people do seem to insulate themselves from unpleasantness in life.

If you've seen any of these movies, you know the opposite is true. It is living with and through struggles that transforms our understanding of ourselves and of others and leaves us with an incredible sense of depth and richness of life. If you have or are dealing with some tough issues like serious family problems or dealing with a boss who makes work life unpleasant or finding that you have some kind of addictive personality; rather than dreaming and working to escape the issues, the surest path to insight, strength and transformation lies in head-on engagement with whatever it is that feels like a threat to your well-being. Working through it, fighting through it, is the surest path to realizing your goals and dreams.

Being alive does hurt. That's a fact. If there is any dimension of your life now that causes pain or struggle, I invite you to give up wishing that it hasn't happened or would go away or that you could get out of here. Rather, begin to pay close attention to what's going on, how you're dealing with it and what useful ways there might be to cope more effectively. The path to the life we want isn't easy but the growing and the changing and the strengthening and the satisfactions derived from the struggle makes the trip, at least from my vantage point, worth the effort.

Harold "Lee" Person, Sophomore Senator

Lee has served on SGA since last year when he held the position of freshman senator. This year, he is involved with the Budget and Planning Committee and the Constitution Committee. Because of new legislation, Lee feels that the senate has a better knowledge of the funding process of the SGA. With the recent election of Barry Graham as SGA Vice-President, Person was voted President Pro Tempore of the Student Government, replacing Graham. Person assumes this position along with his responsibilities as Sophomore Class Senator.

Joe Mitchell, Student Services Coordinator

Mitchell has worked with the Student Government since 1990. He has been involved with the Homecoming committee and is currently serving as chairman of the Student Grievance Board. Mitchell's goal is to promote, coordinate, and implement student services. His list of accomplishments includes, coordinating student discount cards, arranging for suggestion boxes on campus, working with the Environmental Concerns Organization to fund on-campus recycling and establishing the Student Grievance Board. Mitchell was also involved in the process of no longer requiring sports clubs to pay 20% of their profits on event paraphernalia.

note:

Each week in The Seahawk, the Student Government buys one page to update the student body on all Student Government sponsored activities and events. The Public Affairs Committee is responsible for this publication and would like to take advantage of this space to recognize one member of the S.G.A. each week as well as one S.G.A. sponsored committee or organization.

American Music Awards Presented

BY RAMONA HUPP
Arts & Entertainment Editor

The pop/rap musical group C & C Music Factory dominated the American Music Awards on Monday night, winning in five categories. An absent Garth Brooks won three, and Michael Bolton, Luther Vandross and Natalie Cole rounded out the multiple wins list with two each. The American Music Awards, in its 19th year, nominate musical groups for 30 awards from seven confusingly vague categories and asks the record-buying public to select the winners. This process is said to "take into account the geographic location, age, sex, and ethnicity" of the voters.

C & C Music Factory commanded the evening by taking five awards in two different categories. In the dance music category the group took favorite single (Gonna Make You Sweat), favorite artist and favorite new artist. They also took favorite artist and favorite new artist honors in the pop-rock category.

Garth Brooks took best country single (The Thunder Bolt), favorite country album (No Fences) and favorite male country artist.

Brooks' last two albums went to number one and simultaneously appeared on Billboard's top ten for several weeks.

Many were disappointed when the nominating committee for the upcoming Grammys failed to give Brooks any cross-over nominations from the country category to the pop category.

Michael Bolton won both favorite male artist and best album (Time, Love and Tenderness) in the pop-rock category. Bryan Adams stopped Bolton's sweep of this category by scoring favorite pop-rock single for his record-breaking, number one single, (Everything I Do) I Do It For You.

Luther Vandross' two wins were in the soul-R&B division. He took home top album (Power of Love) and top male artist.

The late Nat King Cole helped his daughter win favorite adult contemporary album with their Unforgettable album. The album contains Mr. Cole's digitally reproduced voice duetting with his daughter on his famous classics from the Fifties and Sixties. Miss Cole also took favorite adult contemporary artist.

In the other favorite female categories, Paula Abdul took favorite pop-rock, Mariah Carey, favorite soul-rhythm, and Reba McEntire in the country category.

Hammer, just "Hammer" now, no Mr. Hammer, no M.C. Hammer, just Hammer, was the "M.C." anyway, putting in hosting duties for the evening. He also received an award for favorite rap artist.

Other winners in the rap category were D.J. Jazzy Jeff & The Fresh Prince, who won best rap album (Robeat), and Naughty By Nature, who won favorite new rap artist. Bel Biv DeVoe took home favorite soul-rhythm trophy.

In the heavy-metal/hard rock selection Guns N' Roses was named the favorite artist, with Van Halen winning top album honors for their album For Unlawful Carnal Knowledge.

As expected country group Alabama won best artist, giving them their 15th American Music Award.

James "Good God" Brown did a shakin' medley of his greatest hits and was given the Award of Merit for his outstanding contributions to music over the years.

The American Music Awards is a Dick Clark Production.

"Hooters" Comes To The Stage

Opera House Theatre Company presents Hooters, a comedy by Ted Tally on February 5-9 in the Studio Theatre at Thalian Hall Center for the Performing Arts. Hooters is a perceptive, funny and frank look at mating rituals among the young.

The play, directed by Michael Criscuolo, stars Denise Bass, Drew Dill, Melissa Stanley and Hank Troscianiec. Hooters tells the story of two men and two women and their amorous adventures during a holiday weekend at the beach.

The author of Hooters is Ted Tally, who also wrote the adapted screenplay for the acclaimed film SILENCE OF THE LAMBS.

Performances are at 8:00 p.m. nightly and tickets are $8. For ticket information or reservations call the Center Box Office at 763-3398 or 343-3664. The play contains mature language and subject matter.

Freejack Has Some Loopholes But Some Great Special Effects

BY D. NEAL LEEPER
Entertainment Writer

Mick Jagger, Emilio Estevez, Anthony Hopkins, Rene Russo. These are the names that make the movie FREEJACK more appealing to the public. FREEJACK, directed by Geoff Murphy, is a movie based on the novel "Immortality Inc." by Robert Sheckley. I am told by avid readers that this film is a fairly good representation of the book.

You might ask yourself, "What exactly is a freejack?" A freejack is defined in "Neal terms" as a person who has been snatched from his/her body at the point of their death and restored in the future. To make this definition more clear, picture this: it's the year 2009 where technology has been developed to manipulate time and space.

A group of people known as "bonejacks" are hired to retrieve the body of Alex Furlong, a prominent race car driver, played by Emilio Estevez, at his point of death in the year 1991. These bonejacks get video taped footage of the car accident in 1991 so they can pinpoint the exact time and location of the accident. They travel to the accident site and set up all of their required retrieval equipment. One second before Alex Furlong is doomed to death, his body is snatched to the retrieval bag in the year 2009.

Now, you are asking, Why? Simple. In the year 2009, corporations have grown to the point in which they are governments unto themselves. They possess armies, banks, intelligence agencies, etc.

The head of the McCandless Corporation, played by Anthony Hopkins, desires to have eternal life through the aid of advanced computers, or the "spiritual switchboard." After his death, caused by a futuristic virus, Hopkins' mind is transmitted to the massive computer. Since the switchboard requires large quantities of power, his mind can only be stored for three days. After that, all memories are lost forever in a jumble of data. McCandless, whose mind is stored in the computer, hires a bonejacker team to bring Furlong to the switchboard for a mind transplant. The bonejacker team is headed by a man known as Vacendak, played by Jagger. In this process, the mind of McCandless is to be transferred to the body of Furlong. However, on arrival, Furlong escapes the retrieval team and finds himself loose on the streets of New York. As with all futuristic movies, things on the streets are not quite what they used to be. Anyway, Furlong walks through the city and eventually finds his girlfriend, played by Rene Russo from 1991. Of course, she has aged quite a bit (18 years) and has an executive position with the McCandless Corporation. After accepting the fact that her lost love is still alive, the adventure truly begins.

With such interesting and intriguing advertisements on the television, it's difficult to pass up this film. However, it really does not contain any true "film" value. The plot is strong and the acting is fine, but there are a few loopholes in the story. I do, however, find the portrayal of the future fascinating and the effects superb. On the infamous Fast Forward scale, I rate this movie a 5 (for five bucks); if you have five bucks to spend, go see it, otherwise, wait for it to come to the cheap theater. It really does need to be seen on the wide screen. The true effects of this movie will be lost on video. This movie contains the best "knee in the genital" facial expression in the history of motion pictures. The knee belongs to a nun and that makes it all the more better. Actually, it might be worth the five bucks just to see that. Anyway, until next time.

Cable TV Is Beating Stations

BY LEE WINFREY

Knight-Ridder Newspapers

LOS ANGELES, Calif. — The increasing prosperity of cable television is reflected in more and better original programs scheduled on the major channels during the next four months.

Stellar attractions include coverage of the world's most important yacht race, the America's Cup; a major documentary about the old MGM movie studio; a new educational series for small children based on "Alice in Wonderland"; an authoritative documentary about whales, and comedy specials from Bob Newhart and Roseanne Barr.

A rule of thumb in the industry is that a basic cable channel needs between 25 million and 30 million subscribers to make a profit. Paul Kagan Associates Inc., the leading cable analyst, estimates that 21 cable channels have more than 30 million subs, led by ESPN with 58.9 million.

Contrast that with the fact that two of the big three broadcast networks lost money in 1991 (CBS and NBC), while ABC finished in the black, and the economic realities of today's video marketplace stand out even more starkly.

In the fall, according to Nielsen Media Research, one-quarter of all prime-time viewers watched some form of cable (21 percent basic service, 4 percent premium). Cable's total audience outnumbered independent stations (10 percent) and PBS (4 percent) put together.

Cable may be nearing the top of its growth chart, because 61 percent of American homes with TV are wired for basic cable. Most experts expect cable penetration to top out at about 70 percent, with the remaining 30 percent composed of people who either don't want cable or can't afford it.

But for now, the major cable channels are flourishing.

—HBO:

"Miss Sherri," to premiere sometime in April, stars Sissy Spacek as Sherri Finkbine, host of a children's TV show in Phoenix who caused a national sensation in 1962 by having an abortion after learning that a sedative she had been taking, thalidomide, caused birth defects.

"Afterburn," arriving in May, stars Laura Dern as Janet Harduvel, whose test-pilot husband was killed in a F-16 jet fighter crash. When the crash was blamed on pilot error, she sued the plane's manufacturer, General Dynamics, to clear his name.

"The Last Free Indian," debuting March 28, stars Jon Voight as Alfred Kroeber, an anthropologist who in 1911 in Oroville, Calif., came across the last living member of the Yahi tribe, Ishi, portrayed by Graham Greene.

—Showtime:

Considered HBO's chief premium cable competition even though it refuses to reveal its subscriber count, Showtime has three notable offerings this spring. Particularly timely is an April documentary, so far untitled, profiling film director Oliver Stone, whose current "JFK" has stirred renewed interest in John F. Kennedy's assassination.

Another film director, Zalman King, whose erotic romances include "Wild Orchid" (1990), is the director of a sensual new Showtime series, "Red Shoe Diaries," premiering in May. The exquisite Brigitte Bako is the doomed heroine of the opening episode.

It's not too early to call Showtime's "Bob Newhart: Off the Record" a comedy classic, because he will take several routines from the best-selling record albums that made him famous and convert them into video skits. Airing sometime in the second quarter of 1992, "Off the Record" will re-create such howlers as the driving instructor, Abe Lincoln's press agent, and the defusing of a bomb.

Xcessive Behavior will play "funny blue metal" at Jacob's Run Friday.

This Seahawk Is Having Fun

If you look down the Seahawk bench you may miss him at first, for he is not a screamer or a towel twirler. His dark tan complexion blends most of his 6'8 frame in with the brown suits of the assistant coaches.

But if you ask the Egyptian-born player, Sherif Nabil El-Sanadily, whose name means honest person in English, how he feels about playing basketball in America, he'll tell you straight out he's having "fun all the time."

"I'm happy to be here," El-Sanadily said. "I appreciate coach Eastman (Kevin) for giving me the opportunity to play here and my teammates for supporting me."

El-Sanadily, who attended high school in Kuwait, transferred from American University in Cairo to UNCW on the recommendation of University of Tennessee at Martin's head coach Cal Luther. He did this after learning AU didn't sponsor an intercollegiate basketball program. Luther had coached the Egyptian National Team, of which El-Sanadily was a member, in the World Games.

The new Seahawk forward's father coached the junior national team and taught his son the game.

"Coach Eastman and Luther were good friends, so I came here," El-Sanadily said. "I wanted to get a degree from an American school so I could get a good job and a better life."

A smile quickly evaded his face as he recalled another reason, "Oh, and to play basketball too."

And play he did Saturday night, as he surprised both his teammates and the entire William and Mary squad with his defensive exhibition on the ball court.

El-Sanadily, after coming into the game for the fouled out Bryan Withers, made his presence known by blocking shots, grabbing rebounds, and keeping the ball away for his man, Ben Blocker.

Differences in cultures and standards as well as a new playing style of basketball provided some surprises and awkward moments for El-Sanadily.

"You've really got T.V. over here too," his voice raised quickly with excitement. "I mean, we have only three channels in Egypt, but here you have so many. Your content is different here, we aren't allowed to talk about sex on television but here it is less strict. I really like watching basketball games almost everyday too."

"We never lifted weights in Egypt either, most of the players are smaller and shot from the premier," El-Sanadily said. "Back home, I'm considered a big player but here the game is more inside and more physical. You have to have a powerful 6'7 and 6'9 centers and forwards to compete."

Religion was another obstacle, the Egyptian had to overcome in his new surroundings. El-Sanadily, a devoted Muslim follows a strict code of ethics. One of these is that he can't eat pork. This becomes troublesome when the team orders out for pizzas.

"I just eat the cheese ones," El-Sanadily said while looking skyward, recalling a recent order. Pizza is one of El-Sanadily's favorite American foods.

Alcohol and sex before marriage are also prohibited by his religion.

"My roomie Chris (Meighen) and I spent New Year's Eve watching the orange ball drop and all the people celebrate on T.V. Then we went to bed. It was fun."

Fun? At home? On New Year's Eve? Sober!???

Hmmm! This is indeed a man with willpower.

Yet, despite his differences, El-Sanadily is one of the more popular players on the squad.

In fact his teammates and roomies, Mark Eaton, Keith Adkins, and Meighen thought so highly of him that they tried to reset his alarm clock while he was asleep so he would miss his 6 a.m. weight workout with the team.

"It didn't work," El-Sanadily beamed. "I woke up while they were there and reset after they left. They were sure surprised when I showed up on time."

His teammates have also given him a nickname.

"They called me the Egyptian Lover," El-Sanadily said wrinkling his face after being asked to repeat it, "but I don't know why."

Although the rookie Seahawk enjoys UNCW, he still misses his homeland, his family, and friends that he left behind.

"I was really homesick the first month here," El-Sanadily said. "I hated leaving my family, especially my sister Dina but I knew a degree from here would help me get a good job."

So he continues his "long journey" with his new Seahawk family, laughing and playing with the guys, from Eastman's 2-year-old son, (the team's number one cheerleader) to the 6'5 senior Withers. He said he is happy with the decision he made and the people he has met at UNCW.

Except possibly the individual who inquired, if he rode camels often back home?

UNCW Retires Pitcher's Jersey

BY PATRICK FOWLER

The University of North Carolina at Wilmington honored one of its own last week in a two-day two-part award ceremony on campus.

Minnesota Twins pitcher and former Seahawk Carl Willis was saluted for his achievements both on and off the field as his number 42 UNCW jersey was retired.

"You've done good," UNCW Chancellor James Leutze said at a banquet held for Willis in the University Center Friday evening.

"You've lived a little boy's dream," Seahawk alumni association president John Baldwin added later. "If you do nothing else, you've already brought pride and recognition to this university."

Willis, who helped key the Twins Cinderella-type run to the World Series title this year, attended UNCW from 1979-1983. In that time he compiled a 20-16 overall record and a 4.09 earned run average. The big right-hander's most successful season was in '82-'83 when he posted a 15-8 record and a 2.86 era.

Willis signed a professional contract after the '83 season and left UNCW three hours short of graduating. The Yanceyville, N.C. product then proceeded up the baseball prep ladder, jumping from A to double AA, to triple AAA in a few short months. At 21-years of age Willis was called up for his first major league appearance with the Detroit Tigers.

However, his career didn't remain steady. Over the next nine years Willis saw himself jumping back and forth from the AAA level to the major leagues.

The Twin logged brief stints with the Cincinnati Reds, the Chicago White Sox, the California Angels, and the Cleveland Indians, often moving two to three times a season.

Yet suddenly the travel ended, and at 30 Willis found himself without a team and out of baseball. It was then, with a little encouragement from his wife Paula, that Willis decided to return to school and finish his education.

"Being so close to graduation, but not finishing my degree always bothered me," Willis said. "My wife had her diploma hanging up on the wall and I felt bad that mine wasn't there with her's."

"It was soul searching time for me in my career and I decided that I needed something to fall back on after baseball. I was going to give baseball one more shot but I wanted to finish my education too."

In the end Willis did both. The pitcher received his UNCW diploma after successfully completing correspondence courses through the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. A short time later, the Twins called.

The Minnesota organization was rebuilding their pitching program after a last place finish the year before and extended a bid to Willis to attend their spring training camp.

Willis made the cut and went on to record his best major league season ever, compiling a 8-3 record and a 2.63 era average in 40 appearances.

The once Seahawk continued his dominance in the post-season, retiring 14 of 16 Toronto Blue Jays batters that he faced in the American League Championship Series.

Willis also shut the Atlanta Braves down, getting three quick outs with the bases loaded in the eighth inning in Game Six of the World Series for a 3-3 tie game. This was a game the Twins won in the eleventh on Kirby Puckett's home run and forced a Game 7.

"I never stopped believing in myself," Willis said at a pig pickin' held Saturday at the baseball complex on Brooks Field. "I always wanted to play, but for a while no one wanted to give me a chance. I still can't believe all that happened to me."

The Twin, who spoke briefly at the award benefit, addressed the current Seahawk team at a Twins pitcher was presented his retired UNCW jersey, Saturday morning practice session. Willis emphasized the importance of a good education, but also told the athletes not to give up on their dreams of the big time.

"It is what we all dreamed and talked about," Willis said about his UNCW teammates and days as a Seahawk. "I still can't believe I made it."

Willis, in addition to having his jersey retired by the university, was presented with an engraved plaque for being an outstanding alumni, a windscreen with his name and number painted inside a baseball on it, and a self-portrait in a Seahawk uniform.

'Hawks Skin Tribe

As the Beatles' song goes, "Sometimes you get by with a little help from your friends."

The University of North Carolina at Wilmington Seahawks received help from their bench, especially seldom-used 6'8 forward Sherif El-Sanadily, as UNCW overcame both a 33 shooting percentage and a six point deficit to defeat William and Mary in overtime, 68-64 Monday.

Junior point guard Reggie Venev hit two free-throws with 11 seconds in the overtime period to seal the win for UNCW.

"I told them if we went to overtime, to not come over here out of gas," UNCW head coach Kevin Eastman said. "I think personally we played a better game against American but every person who went out there put in quality time."

That quality showed in the Seahawks' bench play which saw heavy action due to early second half foul troubles by starters Matt Fish, Kenneth Aldrich, and Brian Withers.

All three players had accumulated four fouls with 12 minutes left to play. Withers exiting with his fifth with 11:38 remaining in the game. Eastman went to his string, calling on freshman Chris Meighen, Greg Cave, and El-Sanadily to keep UNCW close until the starters could return for the stretch run in the final five minutes.

"I have a lot of confidence in those guys," Eastman said. "They worked hard in practice and each of them showed what they could do on the court."

El-Sanadily scored four points, grabbed four rebounds, blocked two shots, and held his man, Ben Blocker (12 pts.) to zero points the rest of the game.

The Seahawk reserves kept close to the Tribe, down only four, 50-54, with just under five minutes remaining. The starters returned to tie and took the lead on two Venev free-throws, 56-54.

The Tribe sent the game into overtime when junior forward Thomas Roberts put back a missed Derrick Peters' three-pointer as time expired.

"I kept hoping I would get playing time," El-Sanadily said. "I just play as hard as I can out there."

Shaw led all scorers with 17 points as three of the four Seahawk starters finished in double figures. Fish added 14, followed by both Venev and Eaton with 12 each.

The Seahawks (7-9 overall, 1-4 in conference play) travel to East Carolina on Saturday.

Seahawk Mark Eaton tips the ball back in the goal against Mt. Olive in an contest earlier this year. Eaton scored 12 pts. Saturday in the Seahawks 69-64 overtime win over William and Mary.

Losing Streak Continues

The Lady Seahawks were on the road again this past weekend and, though the results were the same, came away with a new confidence in themselves. Heading into the second leg of the Colonial Athletic Association schedule, UNCW's women are anxious to prove they are a better team than their record indicates.

Saturday, William and Mary squeezed out a 63-60 win in Williamsburg, VA, a game the Lady Seahawks should have won. Trailing by only one at the half, UNCW sleepwalked through the first eight minutes of the second half, seeing the one point deficit grow to 17. Then Lorraine Cordaway took over.

Cordaway scored 12 of her team-high 24 points in the final ten minutes of the game, cutting the Tribe's lead to one with three seconds to play. William and Mary Angel Stanton then hit two free throws to seal the victory.

Coach Sheri Tynes knew this was a game her team let slip away. "Once we regained our composure we played even with them."

Also outstanding for the Lady Seahawks was Zandra Harris. She finished with a "double double" ten points and ten rebounds. Myra Horton contributed nine points and eight rebounds.

This game marked only the second time this year UNCW had out-rebounded its opponent. The Lady Seahawks pulled down 39 boards, while Martin is confident after the past weekend's showing. "We'll do better. We won't be intimidated and I feel that we've got a good chance to get a couple of wins."

Cordaway expressed the same confidence. "It's not an excuse, but we're a young team. When we play an experienced team, we learn. We'll get a couple wins in the second go through."

Saturday the Lady Seahawks play East Carolina University at 3 p.m. and the College of Charleston Wednesday at 7 p.m.

In the second game of the weekend trip, Old Dominion University used its height advantage to pound the Lady Seahawks inside and cruise to a 92-70 win.

ODU's pressure defense also gave UNCW fits, forcing 30 turnovers, including 21 steals. ODU also out-rebounded UNCW 41-33, including a 24-15 edge on the offensive glass.

"Defensively we did a good job," Tynes said after the game. "Giving them) second and third chances is always a factor. We can't give up that many offensive rebounds and expect to win."

"We also had 30 turnovers, 25 were trying to run the half-court offense. We did a good job breaking their full-court press. Offensively we didn't execute."

Pat Martin and Conaway led UNCW with 17 points each. Harris and Horton added 12 each.

UNCW hosts East Carolina Saturday at 3 p.m. and the College of Charleston Wednesday at 7 p.m.

Post Announced

UNCW Sports Information Director (SID) Joe Browning has been selected to be one of the 12 press officers who will assist the international press group covering the XVI Winter Olympics in Albertville, France Feb. 8-23.

He will be responsible for organizing interviews with U.S. team members, coaches, and staff. Browning has been assigned to the U.S. cross country skiers and biathletes in La Lachere and will provide background information and team performances to the international media.

The Seahawk SID will also help staff the U.S. press office at the Main Press Building in La Lachere. Browning was honored to receive the position and stated, "I am looking forward to it with great anticipation."

"It's a tremendous honor to be a member of the U.S. delegation for the Winter Olympics," Browning said. "I'm very appreciative to the U.S. Olympic Committee and the University for affording me."

Browning, who majored in mass communication in college, started out working in the newspaper business for seven years. He wanted to work in public relations but wished to remain in the athletic field.

It was then that UNCW's Sports Information Director job became open. Former SID John Justus vacated the position to take the same post at Wake Forest.

Browning was able to get his position as an Olympic press officer because of his recent work with the Olympic committee at the U.S. Olympic Festivals.

The UNCW SID has worked in three Olympic festivals and was a press officer at the Pan American Games in Havana, Cuba.

Spring Break!

A special daily parade down Main Street U.S.A. in the Magic Kingdom is one of the events celebrating Walt Disney World's 20th Anniversary.

New Orleans Mardi Gras Means Festival Fun

BY RAMONA HUPP
Arts & Entertainment Editor

UNCW's early spring break offers students the opportunity to revel in the merriment of New Orleans' Carnival. This year's Carnival celebration will be reaching a feverish partying pace by February 28, just as we are about to depart, and climaxing on Mardi Gras (French for Fat Tuesday), March the third. Its origins began centuries ago:

Carnival (Latin), loosely translated as "farewell to flesh," is the season of merriment in New Orleans which begins annually on Jan. 6, the Twelfth Night (the feast of Epiphany), and ends at midnight on Mardi Gras. The Carnival season leads up to the penitential season of Lent in which fasting replaces feasting.

Mardi Gras probably developed from ancient tribal rituals of fertility that welcomed the arrival of Spring. A possible ancestor of the celebration Lupercalia, a circus-like orgy held in mid-February in Rome. The early Church fathers, realizing that it was impossible to divorce their new converts from their pagan customs, decided instead to direct them into Christian channels. Thus Carnival was created as a period of merriment that would serve as a prelude to the penitential season of Lent.

Walt Disney World Celebrates Anniversary Offers Special Rate For Spring Break

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor in chief

It's the number one vacation destination for middle-aged Americans. It's the number one honeymoon destination. It's the most visited resort in America.

The images conjured by the Disney name involve a lot of superlatives. And that's the way they like it. "Subtlety," C.E.O. Michael Eisner told Newsweek, "is not one of our goals. We are in the business of exceeding people's very high expectations."

And Walt Disney World in Florida will try to draw a new crowd into the 5,000-acre complex this spring: college students.

From Feb. 22 through April 10, Disney World is offering Disney Break, a special deal for students in Florida for spring break. The special deal consists basically of cheaper tickets and a button.

Spring Breakers can get one-day passes to one park (either the Magic Kingdom, EPCOT Center, or the Disney-MGM Studios) for $22, or a two-day pass (one park per day) for $40. The Disney Break passes offer a discount from the regular rates. Included with each pass is a Disney Break '92 button to identify you to other collegians in the parks.

The Disney World area is located near Orlando and is a fairly easy drive (less than two hours) from either Tampa or Daytona. Just take highway 4 toward central Florida and you can't miss it—the grass is greener and the road signs are purple. A couple of days in Walt's World might make for a refreshing break from brew-soaked Daytona.

But considering some of the vacation packages Disney is offering this spring, a longer visit with Mickey and his pals is worth considering.

Disney is offering five-day vacation packages with various choices and expenses, starting at $420 per person. Included in this plan are four nights at one of two Disney resort hotels, two free meals, one resort activity (like tennis or horseback riding), five Disney Dollars for spending money, and one copy of Steve Birnbaum's Official Guide To Walt Disney World (See the related story on page 2).

As might be expected, Disney offers more expensive and luxurious vacations, all the way to four nights at the Grand Floridian Beach Resort, unlimited use of all attractions, three meals per day, private tennis and golf lessons, etc. If you're up for this, get out your wallet. The package starts at $1407 per person.

But even if your desire for Disney only runs in the two-day area, there is plenty to see this spring.

Through 1991, Disney is celebrating its 20th anniversary with a new daily exhibitions, parades, and prizes for guests.

In the Magic Kingdom (home of Cinderella's Castle and Space Mountain), a daily anniversary parade down Main Street U.S.A. will feature characters from famous Disney flicks including emcee Roger Rabbit. The parade also involves parade spectators, and Roger even chooses one to preside over the days festivities.

When night falls over the Magic Kingdom, its time for another exhibition. "SpectroMagic" is a 20-minute presentation showcasing a computer-coordinated show with house-size cartoons, holograms, fiber-optics, and even a 38-foot wide winged monster to threaten Mickey Mouse, who is encased in prism lights. D.C. Is Close, Entertaining

BY RAMONA HUPP
Arts & Entertainment Editor

Washington, D.C. may sound like a dry, bureaucratic place, but nothing could be farther from the truth. In fact, studies have predicted by the end of this decade D.C. will be the biggest metropolis, overshadowing New York and Los Angeles in culture, population and dimension.

This city offers such a diversity of interests that you'll have a hard time trying to decide what to do first. The best part about D.C. is that it has a number of all day activities that are free, or relatively cheap.

It's best if you stay on the outskirts of D.C., like Arlington or Springfield. Both areas are covered by the Metro service into D.C.

The Metro is a very impressive subway system that facilitates much of the area. What the underground system doesn't cover the bus service does, and tickets, purchased in Metro stations, can be used on both. The Metro has a easily defined system and is clean and safe.

During your vacation, sleep in, or take a long breakfast before going into the city. Many of the downtown attractions, such as The Smithsonian, don't open until 10:00 a.m., and it's rather difficult to find a restaurant that serves breakfast in this area. (An added bonus: Metro fares go down if you travel during off-peak hours.)

Your first stop should be The Mall. The Mall consists of two parallel gravel walk-ways which extend from the Washington Monument to the Nation's Capital with The Smithsonian Institute buildings on either side.

Begin your tour with The Washington Monument, where you can get a bird's eye view from its observation deck. The view overlooks the entire Mall, governmental buildings, the Potomac, and The Smithsonian museums and is nationally stimulating.

After your aerial view of D.C., your next stop should be The Smithsonian Institute Information Center, which is a known as the Castle, the Gothic looking building located in the middle of the Mall. There you will find pamphlets and touch-screen programs on each and every exhibit to help guide you through the 14 buildings that house its impressive collections of art and history.

Touring all the Smithsonian has to offer can take more than three or four days. A small museum on the map can turn out to contain several underground levels, such as the Ripley Center, which is a small circular shaped building which winds down to a massive underground museum.

If your time is limited, select one or two museums that interest you most. All tours through the museums are self-guided, and you are invited to go at your own pace. Don't feel compelled to travel in groups through the museums. The Mall area is heavily traveled and you'll feel secure walking around on your own.

The larger buildings offer cafeteria style dining should you get hungry and each museum has a gift shop with unique items that reflect their exhibits.

Georgetown

The Metro stops about ten blocks from the Georgetown area but walking or transferring to a bus are better alternatives than trying to find a parking place. (Free parking is VERY limited.)

You should spend at least one day walking around this area. It has a flavor all its own. If you plan on going bar-hopping, this is the place. Clubs abound in D.C./Georgetown area. Ask friends or locals for the most entertaining.

One suggested is called Heaven, and if it's filled to Walt Disney World Guidebooks Give Disney Perspective

BY JOHN SINGH

Knight-Ridder Newspapers

Be prepared.

It's the one bit of advice that every guidebook to Walt Disney World advises. They're the two wisest words you'll ever hear when visiting the 43-square-mile resort.

A passel of publications is available, all of which claim to be the best way to prepare for a trip to the most popular tourist attraction in the world. But couldn't the $10 you'll spend on a guidebook be better spent at Walt Disney World itself? Maybe, but if you go to the parks guideless—even if you've gone before—you could be taking unnecessary risks.

"When you have a guidebook, you learn the tips on how to maneuver through the parks, where the lines may be longer during the day... that kind of stuff is really helpful," says Disney spokeswoman Jennie Hess.

There are a lot of guides to choose from. Still, a $10 investment can provide a healthy return: Lots of waiting time will be shaved off from your visit, and you may even spend a few dollars less on food and souvenirs.

The guides promise to teach you how to conquer the 28,000 acres (that's 43 square miles, which is larger than the city of San Francisco) of the World. Some do, some don't. Here's a look at 10 of the most widely available books.

"The Unofficial Guide to Walt Disney World and EPCOT," travel writer Bob Sehlinger and a staff of seven compiled this exhaustive and useful book that wasn't sanctioned by Disney. (That's why there are no pictures.) But that's given the authors a chance to tell which rides aren't worth it and which ones shouldn't be missed.

In truth, the book is mostly laudatory—almost every attraction rates at least three of five stars. Sehlinger gives a breakdown of each ride's appeal for everyone from pre-schoolers to senior citizens. "Nifty graphics prove why early December is the best time to visit, and there are complete reviews for every attraction and park, including those at Universal Studios.

What makes the guide stand out, though, is that it's so easy to use. Each attraction listing is followed by its capacity, expected waiting time, a rating, a description, and tips to make seeing it easier.

The book explains how rides operate and why some never seem to have lines while others are always crowded. There's also a critical look at the creation of Walt Disney World and what it's meant to Florida.

Read the "Unofficial Guide" and you'll know everything you'll ever need to know about getting around Walt Disney World.

"Birnbaum's Walt Disney World: The Official Guide"

In his introduction, Steve Birnbaum says Disney had no control over the book's final content. They obviously can't object, because Birnbaum gushes over the parks, almost to the point that you begin to wonder if he's telling the truth. (Really now, can every restaurant be delicious?)

The guide spends too much space describing the rides and not enough time telling how to beat the crowds and avoid waiting in line too long. Then again, all of that detail makes for interesting reading, and Walt Disney World fans will enjoy it. So will kids, who will love the Disney characters and bright colors used throughout.

"The Official Guide" gives you what you need to survive, but not always in the most helpful or the most honest way.

"Walt Disney World with Kids"

Don't think you have to have kids to buy this one: It's a remarkably informative and entertaining guide that takes much of the same information in Sehlinger's "Unofficial Guide" and makes it easier to comprehend.

Although much of it is geared to parents with small children, there are a lot of sections that the childless will find valuable: which areas of the park are good for afternoon rests; how to spend your critical first and last hours in the parks; and which rides have slow-moving lines.

Some of the tips aren't so hot. For example, Wiley suggests visiting the Animation Tour at MGM in the late evening—when all of the animators will have gone home and there will be little left to see. And some suggestions are downright strange, like using the Hall of Presidents in the Magic Kingdom to breast-feed babies. The updated guide includes Universal Studios.

"Walt Disney World guidebooks: EPCOT Center, Magic Kingdom, Disney-MGM Studios" and "The Disney Insider Guide"

The best thing about these glossy brochures is that they're free. They also provide much of the information that's in many of the $10 books. Filled with maps, photos and thumbnail sketches of the rides and attractions, the guidebooks pinpoint locations of shops, restaurants and restrooms in individual theme parks. The downside is that they're wholly uncritical. They don't exist to tell you about long lines or expensive food. Everything is "incredible!" or "breathtaking!" or "delicious."

The Insider Guide gives up-to-date prices, phone numbers and "expert tips," like "Find out what's going on and don't miss a thing!" But it also provides truly pertinent details like how to order a Kosher meal and where to find a babysitter or a bank.

"Disney World and Beyond, The Ultimate Family Guidebook/Family Fun Cards"

Skip the cards, a novel idea that doesn't work. The concept is that you can shuffle the cards and take them with you as a portable guide that's less bulky than a book. But they don't provide much information.

The book is good, but contains a lot of extraneous details, like name games to play while waiting in line with kids. (Example: Everybody asks questions, then the group decides which one is the stupidest.) It really does contain some tips that can't be found anywhere else—for example, guided tours of the Morocco pavilion at EPCOT are available on request—but much of the information seems lifted directly from Sehlinger's "Unofficial Guide."

"Orlando and Disney World, A Travel Venture Guide"

A detailed, fact-filled book, the guide offers lots of information, but not a lot of criticism. It's good to know about the rides and attractions, but author Bob Martin rarely tells whether a ride is worth taking or skipping.

The book tells about a lot more than just Walt Disney World—virtually every Orlando attraction, from EPCOT to the Alton Polasek Galleries in Winter Park is included in the book, which also offers a brief history of Orlando and Walt Disney World.

The cover promises "information found in no other single guidebook," and it's true—mostly because it tries to cram too much into its 255 pages.

"The Road to Walt Disney World, A Mobil Travel Guide"

For Floridians, this guide—filled with hotels and restaurants to visit on trips from faraway cities—will offer little. The section dealing with Walt Disney World is complete but not detailed, although the guide offers a comprehensive rating of the hotels. (The Grand Floridian is the only on-site resort to get four stars.) For Uncle Earl and Aunt Fannie who are driving in from Evanston, the guide might make a nice gift. For residents, though, it won't be at all worthwhile.

"Disney World for Kids of All Ages"

This low-budget guide from a small Sacramento, Calif., publisher tries hard to compete with the big guys. But hand-drawn maps, sketchy information and strange advice (check the tongues of your shoes before you leave) doom it to obscurity.

Gamely attempting to be a guide to the entire Central Florida area, the book includes sections on Sea World, Universal Studios, Cypress Gardens and Church Street Station in Orlando.

A chapter hopefully called "The Scope on Walt Disney World" is little more than a compilation of the free Disney guidebooks.

throughout Walt Disney World or by calling Guest Information at 1-824-4321.

"The Disney Insider Guide." Free. Provided by Walt Disney World after making on-site resort reservations. Resort information phone number: 1-934-7639.

Among the most common tips: Buy a multi-day ticket. A one-day ticket gets you in to only one park. (You can visit Disney-MGM Studios but not EPCOT Center.) It's more expensive but worth it in the long haul: Multi-day tickets don't expire until they're used up. If you plan on staying more than one day, stay at an on-site hotel. It may be more expensive, but will save you lots of time commuting. Book hotels early, especially the low-priced Caribbean Beach Resort and Port Orleans.

At EPCOT, visit World Showcase in the morning and Future World in the evening. You'll be working against the crowds and will save a lot of time.

Try offbeat EPCOT restaurants like Akershus in Norway or Restaurant Marrakesh in Morocco. They're easier to get into, and the food is unusual and good.

If you want a picture with Mickey Mouse, your best bet is Mickey's Starland in the Magic Kingdom.

The most overlooked attractions and rides (often with the shortest lines): Symbiosis, a film in The Land at EPCOT; El Rio del Tiempo ride in Mexico at EPCOT; Dreamflight in Tomorrowland at the Magic Kingdom. Always crowded rides: Star Tours at Disney-MGM Studios; Space Mountain and Big Thunder Mountain Railroad in the Magic Kingdom; Spaceship Earth in EPCOT's Future World.

Often quoted as the attractions most worth skipping: Discovery Island, a minor theme park; Journey into Imagination at EPCOT (but a must for kids); Grand Prix Raceway in the Magic Kingdom.

Disney-MGM Studios is small—so small that, during the summer, it often fills up and closes its gates. Arrive early or late in the evening.

Steve Birnbaum's "Official Guide" is the most popular guidebook. First published in 1982, it hit the New York Times best-seller list last year, the first time a travel guidebook has been listed.

Things change fast in the World: Most of the current guidebooks don't list new attractions like "MuppetVision 3D" or the SpectroMagic parade. Disney officials refuse to release yearly attendance figures, but more than 300 million people have visited the Magic Kingdom since 1971.

Florida residents can buy a $90 (not including tax) "Four Season Salute" pass that admits them to any of the three parks during four predetermined times. This year, those will be: Jan. 1 through Feb. 9; May 1 through June 7; Aug. 14 through Sept. 30; and Nov. 29 through Dec. 20.

Walt Disney World has increased ticket prices 12 times since 1984. While increases are always announced in a media blitz, it's best to call ahead to confirm ticket prices. Several books have incorrect prices.

finale is a 100-foot coach for Cinderella. Disney officials say the combination of sight and sound is spectacular. "The music and show are totally integrated," said Disney entertainment vice president Ron Logan.

The SpectroMagic show, however, has some competition in EPCOT Center. At the end of each day at the Experimental Prototype Community of Tomorrow (EPCOT), IllumiNations lights up the sky and the lagoon surrounding the World Showcase area in EPCOT.

The presentation involves all of the pavilions in World Showcase, each representing a separate country. Each pavilion lights up with a display featuring lasers, fireworks, and gigantic fountains, all coordinated with the country's native music, and the reaction from the crowd.

As a part of the anniversary celebration, EPCOT also opens each day with an air and water show in the same area.

Along with the Magic Kingdom and EPCOT Center, Disney features the Disney-MGM Studios. This attraction touts the Great Movie Ride, a collection of famous movie scenes recreated using lifelike auto-animatronic figures.

The park also offers an extended tour of the movie production studio located right behind the park. There you might see actual movies or television shows being filmed. The tour also shows Disney animators at work on future cartoons.

After the Disney day is done, there is a notable difference in the faces of those following the pack of thousands of people heading back to the Magic Kingdom parking lot (one which is large enough to hold the entire California Disneyland complex as well as 500 extra cars), and the lucky people boarding the significantly less crowded monorails destined for their on-site hotels. The look on their faces is fatigue.

So, if you're planning an extended Disney vacation, it might be worth your dollar to stay on the complex for convenient relaxation. And there is another reason to stay as well.

Let's face it, when Disney opened as a haven for good old sin-free family values, it was tough to find a cigarette, much less a beer. But all of that is changing.

With the recent opening of Pleasure Island, Disney is gaining a nightlife. Pleasure Island is chock-full of "themed" nightclubs and movie theaters (at Disney, a theme for everything is obligatory). The night spot features three dance clubs, a comedy club and ten first-run movie theaters. And yes, even karaoke has come to Disney World, at SuperStar Studios.

If you're still looking for sun and sand on your spring break, Disney has that covered as well. Typhoon Lagoon is the largest water park in Florida, and features all the regular stuff, including a lazy river to ride on intertubes. In fact, the casual ride down Castaway Creek might be just what you need after trying to see in a few days everything Disney has to offer.

For more information and reservations, call Walt Disney World at (407) W-DISNEY.

Some rules don't change over spring break.

Another interesting neighborhood is Adams Morgan, where a number of cultures converge to make an enticing eclectic mix. Take a day to visit it and Chinatown.

Going Abroad?

Another note of interest for students thinking of going abroad in the future: D.C. is one of the locations for CIEE (Council for International Education and Exchange). They are a vital source for students who want to travel, work, or study in Europe. They act like a travel agency for students at below average prices. They also arrange for work permits. You can have everything, short of your passport being processed, done through this office. — Dallas Airport in D.C. is also a great point of departure for your European destination.

Winter Fun Spring In Squaw Valley Means Skiing

BY JENNY NEAL
Staff Writer

Squaw Valley is a skier's dream come true. In fact, North Lake Tahoe, which is only seven short miles away from Squaw Valley, is considered one of the largest ski destinations in the world. Tahoe receives over 400 inches of snow annually, constantly replenishing the snow base. In Squaw valley, you need never worry of finding slush where snow should be.

Ski season at Squaw Valley/Lake Tahoe is from November through May. UNCW's spring break in early March is a perfect time to take advantage of the well-packed snow surface and outdoor activities. The temperature generally heats up to 50 degrees during the day.

Squaw Valley, the famous site of the 1960 Winter Olympics, offers 600 acres of skiable terrain with 70% of its slopes for beginners and intermediate skiers. One of the most spectacular views is from the aerial tramway from the base of the valley to the summit. From this cable-suspended tram, Lake Tahoe shines like a blue jewel surrounded by various mountain peaks ranging as high as 10,100 feet. The snow-capped mountains at this resort rivals the beauty of any pictured in Switzerland. In fact, Lake Tahoe is one of the largest mountain lakes in the world. It is seventy-two miles around and a scenic 2 1/2 hour drive. Some locals actually refer to the area as "Little Switzerland."

The least expensive way to enjoy Squaw Valley is to get a hotel in Reno or Lake Tahoe. Though Reno hotels offer a shuttle service to the slopes, it's too much time spent riding when you could be skiing. The Hyatt Regency in Incline Village on the North Shore at Lake Tahoe offers beautiful views and clean rooms, and it only 7 miles from the slopes via shuttle services.

Delta Airlines is currently offering a very reasonable vacation package which includes round-trip air transportation to Reno, accommodations, including room tax, and a rental car with unlimited mileage. (Most car rental agencies require you to be 21, with a major credit card, to rent a car.) Caution is suggested to those who have never driven snowy mountainous roads.

With this package, Delta is also offering bonus features which includes one free day of ski equipment with paid rental for two or more days, ski school, lift tickets, trail pass, and a two-hour snowmobile tour of Reno/Lake Tahoe. These are all two-for-one specials.

Delta's package is based on double occupancy. Rates per person for 3 nights/plus air transportation and bonus features included in this package start as low as $698. Of course this doesn't include spending money. An additional $400 is necessary to enjoy the nightlife, which offers lake cruises and gambling. (Gambling at the casinos is strictly prohibited if you are under 21.) Call any local travel agency for more information.

Travel Questions And Answers...

BY JEAN ALLEN
Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel

Q. My boyfriend and I are planning to marry sometime this year. Several months ago I saw some information in your column about all-inclusive honeymoon and wedding packages in the Bahamas. We are very much interested in getting married anywhere in the Caribbean, and wondered if you would provide this information. — S.T., Delray Beach, Fla.

A. There are resorts that offer to do all the work for you, arranging the wedding and the honeymoon in one package. But I don't have enough information to give you a wide choice.

After talking with representatives of several Caribbean islands, I realized that each has its own complicated rules for marriages of non-residents.

So my advice is to let an expert do your planning.

Unless you want to spend weeks tied up in red tape, filling out forms and making phone calls when you should be enjoying bridal showers and trousseau shopping, there are some firms whose sole business is arranging weddings in foreign spots.

Far Away Weddings of Dallas has arranged weddings in hundreds of locations outside the United States, including archaeological ruins in Mexico, a chapel in the Swiss Alps, a castle in Scotland, a beach in Hawaii or the Caribbean. The firm takes care of all the details from site selection to music and catering, including assistance with documentation for civil or religious ceremonies. This might include passports, visas, inoculations, various medical tests and even a period of residency on the island. It works with travel agents who handle the transportation to the wedding site.

Far Away Weddings is at 4516 Lovers Lane, Suite 178, Dallas, Texas 75225, 1-800-882-WEDS.

Another firm, called New Beginnings, a British operator with a United States office in St. Petersburg, arranges weddings all over the world as well as the Caribbean. It also deals with legal barriers and the varying regulations of nations (for example, in Jamaica if the sun begins to set before the ceremony is complete, the marriage will not be legal). The firm handles arrangements for the couple and their wedding parties. Contact New Beginnings at 1-813-864-3013.

Q. All good things seem to be "double occupancy." For example, below your column on a recent Sunday, the "notes" section mentioned a variety of studio and one-bedroom apartments from $170 for five nights, per person, double. A multitude of cruises was advertised at prices "per person, double occupancy."

Last year I really had to search for an affordable small efficiency on Waikiki Beach for two weeks, off season. It was very elementary, but I wasn't in it very much.

There is not a lot for older singles on a budget.

All of my friends seem to be young and working, or old and caring for someone else who is ill. I don't mind traveling alone but it gets expensive. Any suggestions? — Mrs. B., Fort Lauderdale, Fla.

A. On an Elderhostel trip last summer, at least half of our group of 30 were singles, some traveling with friends and some going it alone. Everyone had a fine time. This is probably budget travel for older people at its best, even though it was decidedly not deluxe touring. There was no singles surcharge. Elderhostels travel all over the world. Write for a catalog at 75 Federal St., Boston, Mass. 02110.

Saga Holidays also caters to older travelers, and although there is a singles surcharge on rooms, it's usually lower than the supplements charged to independent single travelers, and there are usually so many singles on the trips that roommate matches can be made. Saga has a range of offerings from stay-put stays in apartments or hotels in places like Spain, Portugal, Malta, southern France, London, Paris (and even Lauderdale-by-the-Sea) that last from a week to several weeks, to escorted bus tours or combinations of the two. Contact Saga at 1-800-343-0273.

Another organization catering to older travelers is Grand Circle Travel, which operates tours and stay-put holidays similar to Saga's. Grand Circle can be reached at 1-800-248-3737.

Both these organizations provide names of potential companions on trips, with quarterly magazines full of applications by mature singles looking for travel companions. Getting the magazines requires paying a small annual membership fee.

A number of colleges, universities and museums offer group trips that attract many singles. For a good run-down on hundreds of those, consult "Guide to Academic Travel," published by Shaw Guides Inc., 625 Biltmore Way, Coral Gables, Fla. 33134, 1-305-446-8888.

Singletown arranges tours and cruises for singles, and tries to put people into compatible age groups. It canceled its 1991 Europe trips but is expected to return there in 1992. Meanwhile, it is heavily into cruise opportunities. The tour operator's address is P.O. Box 1999, Rye, N.Y. 10580; 1-800-223-6490.

Most cruise lines offer singles shares, a plan in which you sign up to share a double cabin, and if no suitable roommate is found by the cruise line by sailing time, you get the room at a per-person double rate with no singles supplement.

Q. In London, we have stood in line at the half-price booth in Leicester Square to buy discounted tickets to the same day's shows (as you once remarked in your column). It worked well, but we wasted too much time we could have spent sightseeing, and the really top shows were not available. Is there any other way to get last-minute tickets without the long wait? — G.H., Hollywood, Fla.

A. There are two ways: Show up at the box office a half-hour to an hour before show time and hope some of the ticket holders didn't arrive. The second way is simpler: Ticket brokers Edwards and Edwards now operate a Theatre Tonight service, which you can call to find out what show tickets are available that night. Tickets can then be charged on a Visa or Mastercard and picked up at the box office. Edwards and Edwards charges full price but there is no surcharge or special fee, and the firm guarantees you'll pay no more than box office price. In London, call Theatre Tonight at 071-753-0333; the switchboard is open from noon to 6 p.m. for that night's performances.

Marine Science Research UNCW Proposed As Prime Location

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor in chief

With a favorable vote from the UNC board of governors, UNCW will become the premiere site in the university system for marine sciences. As the premiere center, UNCW would receive most state funding for research in the field, including funding for a major laboratory on university property at Myrtle Grove Sound, behind Masonboro Island.

The UNC board of governors, which oversees the 16 campuses in the North Carolina university system, heard a report by a consultant group of four university presidents advising that UNCW become the prime site for marine science. The board will probably vote on the recommendation sometime this spring.

If approved, the marine sciences facility would be operated by UNCW, and would be available to faculty and students from the other state universities.

The consulting group was joined by the board of governors to research the strong academic areas at each university. The board plans to send the majority of funding to those strong programs, while reducing funding to redundant programs at other universities, said Mark Lanier, special assistant to Chancellor Leutze. The goal, Lanier said, is to funnel money to the best academic programs, instead of diluting the funds over the entire state.

The consultants' report stated, "If the state's resources are to be most effectively deployed in this field, it would appear that some cooperative effort, with laboratory and research facilities centered at UNCW, should be undertaken."

The report stated that the facility should be used in cooperation with other state schools to allow them to grant graduate degrees in marine science.

Officials at some universities objected to the plan, saying that building a major facility at UNCW could mean the demise of existing programs including UNC Chapel Hill's Institute of Marine Science in Morehead City.

Lanier said that putting the center at UNCW is the best option. "It makes more sense to build it here," he said. "We're sitting right beside the world's largest living laboratory."

Lanier also pointed to UNCW's Undersea Research Center — one of only six in the nation — as an indication of the strength of the program.

Money for marine science would be used more efficiently at UNCW because, unlike the facility at Morehead City, the main campus is only a few miles away, meaning that necessities like a physical plant and food services would not have to be duplicated at the facility, Lanier said.

Dirk Frankenberg, the director of the UNC-Chapel Hill's facility told the Raleigh News and Observer that placing the center at UNCW was a "laughable" idea. "It's at the end of the coast and it will end marine science in the state as we know it," he said.

James Merritt, director of UNCW's Center for Marine Science Research (CMSR) in Wrightsville Beach said that Frankenberg's remarks might indicate a fear that doctoral programs at his facility might end up here. "They used the worst case scenario," he said.

The consultants' report stated that the existing doctoral programs should remain where they are, but could eventually be moved to the UNCW facility.

Merritt said that the UNCW facility wouldn't necessarily mean less money for other programs. "Our intent is to get the pot of money bigger," he said. Money for these programs comes from government grants and private donations in addition to the state funding.

The site at Myrtle Grove was zoned for development last year. Water, sewer and electricity for the site is under construction, and should be completed by the end of this month, Lanier said. A 1000-square foot building is also planned to be constructed at the site in the next two months.

The new building will be used in the CMSR's participation in the North Carolina Estuarine Research Reserve program, Merritt said. The program involves collecting data from the area, and conducting educational activities, he said.

Even if the board of governors rejects the recommendation, UNCW will still develop the land on Myrtle Grove Sound, so the $50,000 spent on utilities "won't be money down the drain," Lanier said.

Provost Search Narrowed To Six

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

The search to fill the position of provost, the highest academic office at UNCW, has been narrowed to six candidates. The office is being vacated by Charles Cahill on July 1.

"The selection of the next provost will be the most important decision that I make this year and one of the most important that I will make as chancellor," said Chancellor James R. Leutze in a memo to the UNCW faculty and staff.

"The chancellor will play a big part in this. He will determine who gets the job and he intends to delegate as much as possible to the new provost," Paul Eaglin, special assistant to the chancellor for legal affairs, said. "The provost does a lot. He or she will be the chief academic affairs officer."

The provost oversees all of the academic and professional programs of the university, including the school of arts and sciences, the Cameron School of business, the school of nursing, the school of education, and the Center for Marine Science Research. The provost also oversees faculty recruitment and tenure, and intercollegiate athletics.

During his or her visit, each candidate will meet with university officials and attend a reception at Kenan House, the home of the chancellor. Also, the candidate will speak on the issues and challenges of higher education in the 1990's in Cameron Auditorium.

The candidates are Dr. James

C. Foster, Dr. Leonard J. Pietrafesa, Dr. Joyce Scott, Dr. Max J. Skidmore, Dr. J. Scott Colley and Dr. Marvin K. Moss. The candidates will visit the campus in February and March.

The first of the candidates to visit the campus will be Foster. He will visit Feb. 12-13. Foster is presently dean of the College of Arts, Sciences and Letters and a professor of history at the University of Michigan at Dearborn.

Scott is presently a senior consultant at the American Association of State Colleges and Universities in Washington, DC. She will visit the campus Feb. 24-25.

Visiting the campus Feb. 27-28 will be Dr. Max J. Skidmore. Skidmore is the dean of the College of Arts and Sciences and a professor of political science at the University of Missouri at Kansas City.

The next two candidates visiting the campus are Colley and Moss. Colley is the provost and dean of the faculty at Hampden-Sydney College in Virginia. He will visit the campus Mar. 9-10. Moss is the associate vice chancellor of Marine Sciences at the University of California at San Diego and deputy director of the Scripps Institution of Oceanography at La Jolla, CA. He will visit Mar. 12-13.

Pietrafesa, department head of Marine and Atmospheric Sciences and professor of Oceanography at North Carolina State University, will visit Mar. 17-18.

Foster's speech is scheduled for Feb. 13 at 4 p.m. Eaglin said that the speeches are open to "whoever wants to come — on or off campus."

Thong-Clad Vendors To Be Veiled In Fla.

BY JUDY A. PLUNKETT
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — Getting an unobstructed view of a thong bikini-clad hot dog vendor will soon require more effort than driving by her stand and leaning out the car window.

In a couple of weeks, thong vendors will have to stand behind four-foot-high walls that surround them on all sides, Palm Beach County commissioners decided Tuesday.

The enclosure is for the benefit of those who don't want themselves or their children to see the vendors when they drive by, Commissioner Karen Marcus said. "It's a community issue and a concern to a lot of people."

Vendors may get out of using an enclosure if they comply with a dress code that allows no bikini clothing than a French-cut bikini — a suit that is cut above the hip and covers most of the buttocks.

Even that restriction is too much, said Gloria Gonzalez, a hot dog vendor. The government shouldn't be able to dictate what people wear while doing business, she said.

To show her opposition, Gonzalez wore a floor-length black robe and covered her face with a black scarf while her attorney, Barry Silver, addressed commissioners.

Silver, a lawyer with the American Civil Liberties Union, urged commissioners to survey county residents to learn if they find thong-clad vendors offensive.

A ban on thongs was sought by a religious minority a suggestion they ignored. The ban on thongs was sought by a religious minority and isn't something the majority of the public wants, Silver said.

"What is offensive is when a small group of people who are intolerant force their views on others," Silver said.

The ordinance will go into effect after the Florida secretary of state signs it in a couple of weeks. Violating the ordinance will be a second-degree misdemeanor punishable by a fine of as much as $500, 60 days in jail or both.

Marcus anticipates problems from vendors who try to make a loophole by using the enclosure, but stand on a platform. They would be dealt with later, she said.

Gonzalez said she expects to be arrested when the ordinance goes into effect because she will continue to wear a thong bikini when working her hot dog stand.

Complying with the dress code would hurt her business, Gonzalez said, citing the drop in sales she has endured while wearing long pants and a sweater this winter. The enclosure isn't an option, either.

"I'm not going to have the hardship of carrying a four-foot sign around," she said.

Years Early Hole In Ozone May Open Over U.S.

BY SHIRISH DATE
Orlando Sentinel

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — An ozone hole could open over the Northern Hemisphere this spring — years earlier than expected — subjecting parts of the United States, Canada and Europe to dangerous ultraviolet radiation, NASA scientists said Monday.

"None of the news is good," said James Anderson, a Harvard University chemist and NASA investigator.

Using a high-altitude plane and a newly launched satellite, researchers have found record levels of ozone-destroying chlorine over Canada, New England, Greenland, the British Isles, Scandinavia and Russia.

Such levels could thin the ozone layer by 30 percent to 40 percent for brief periods this spring, the scientists said. The well-known ozone hole over Antarctica, by contrast, depletes 50 percent to 60 percent of the protective ozone blanket.

"Everybody should be alarmed about this," said Michael Kurylo, manager of NASA's upper-atmosphere research program. "We're seeing conditions primed for ozone destruction. It's in a far worse way than we thought."

The consequences for those living in the areas that could be affected — many of them fair-skinned and prone to sunburns — include an increased risk of skin cancer, cataracts and damage to the human immune system.

Anderson and other scientists presented the preliminary results of their most recent studies at a press conference televised from NASA headquarters in Washington.

They and other scientists have long feared that manmade chemicals containing chlorine would eventually chew through the ozone layer over the Arctic Circle, just as they have over the South Pole.

But they had not expected to find the chemicals so soon, and in such abundance.

"It's somewhat disconcerting to see so much of this unnatural

Satellite to study ozone layer

NASA's atmospheric research satellite will study why the ozone layer is thinning. Ozone, a form of oxygen found mostly in the upper atmosphere, protects Earth from sun's ultraviolet rays.

How ozone is lost

- Chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) from aerosol cans, other sources rise to the upper atmosphere
- Ultraviolet light splits CFCs apart, releasing chlorine
- Chlorine converts ozone into ordinary oxygen by knocking out one oxygen atom substance that is destroying our ozone layer over such a large area," NASA scientist Joe Waters said as he narrated a computer animation of the chlorine concentrations found over the Northern Hemisphere.

"We must work in a concerted way to speed up controls of these compounds," Anderson said, adding that nations of the world should move forward the deadline they set in 1989 to ban production of chlorofluorocarbons. The current deadline is the year 2000.

The video presentation, based on data taken from instruments aboard NASA's high-flying plane in January, showed a cloud of the chlorine monoxide forming and growing over the Northern Hemisphere.

Ozone, a highly reactive molecule made up of three oxygen atoms, breaks down into ordinary, two-atom oxygen molecules in the presence of

How the satellite will work

- Nine instruments; some looking down, some sideways through the upper atmosphere
- Will measure 16 chemicals in upper atmosphere
- Will measure speed, direction of winds that move ozone

chlorofluorocarbons — a refrigeration coolant once commonly used as an aerosol gas — and other pollutants.

Ozone absorbs the sun's ultraviolet radiation, which can cause skin cancer; ordinary oxygen doesn't.

Anderson said the seasonal Antarctic ozone hole — discovered about a decade ago — is made worse by the expanse of ocean surrounding Antarctica. The prevailing weather patterns maintain a wall of wind around the South Pole that tends to trap the ozone-destroying chemicals in one place.

The Northern Hemisphere, in contrast, has mountains ranges that generally prevent such a wall from forming, Anderson said. However, six months' worth of data from the NASA jet and the recently launched Upper Atmosphere Research Satellite has indicated there is enough of a "wall" to keep the high levels of chlorine over populated areas close to the Arctic Circle.

If weather conditions keep the chlorine where it is through the end of winter, ozone levels could start dropping drastically, as much as 2 percent a day, by early spring.

That could lead to warnings similar to those already issued each year in Australia and New Zealand, advising people to stay out of the sun during periods of low ozone.

But while humans can take precautions, other species — like wheat, vegetables and the fish in the sea that humans count on for food — cannot.

"It's very difficult to take the precautions if one is a plant or a phytoplankton or some other organism in the food chain," Kurylo said.

Recycling successful

BY JENNIFER WILSON
Staff Writer

"We only make five dollars for each ton of newspapers," Towana Moore, director of Auxiliary Services, said of the recycling program at UNCW. "We're obviously not in it for the revenue; it's just the environmentally right thing to do and it's convenient for the students."

Moore is referring to the expanding recycling program that has been on campus since September 1991. Aside from aluminum can receptacles in residence halls and academic buildings, there is a recycling building that accepts newspapers, aluminum and plastics numbered one or two inside the recycling triangle. The building is located in the parking lot by the Campus Police.

The program began earlier this year partly because students living in off-campus apartments had little or no means to recycle their trash, Moore explained. "The city only picks up from houses."

Funded by the auxiliary services, the recycling program makes recycling both convenient and easy for on-campus students and those living off campus, who previously had to drop trash off at the city's designated drop-sites.

"One student who works with me and some of the guys in the vending department sell the newspapers; the money from which goes back into buying more aluminum can receptacles. The plastic, glass and aluminum cans are taken to the city's recycling centers," Moore said.

The program is continually expanding, Moore said. "We're getting ready to put boxes in residence halls to recycle 6-pack rings. These boxes should be out in the next week."

Homecoming Brings Big Names To Area

BY JENNY NEAL
Staff Writer

MTV comedian Colin Quinn will be one of the main attractions at this year's Homecoming events, February 12-15.

"I'm really excited about the events planned for this year's homecoming. We have four days of various activities planned in order to get the students of UNCW involved, after all, homecoming isn't just for alumni, it is for everybody," Shanda Williams, chair of ACE (Association of Campus Entertainment) said.

One of the activities planned is a competition between organizations for a $100 cash prize given to the organization with the most in attendance at the bonfire. This is planned for Thursday Feb. 13th. Surf 107 and Domino's will also be on hand. Chancellor Leutze will be the keynote speaker.

On Friday, February 14, there will be a banner contest held in Trask Coliseum at 2:00 p.m. Prizes will be given for 1st, 2nd, and 3rd place.

On Saturday February 15th starting at 10:00 a.m. there will be a Homecoming Parade. At the UNCW vs George Mason game the 1992 Homecoming Court will be announced and a queen crowned. A dance will be held at the University Center Ballroom, from 9:30 pm to 1:00 a.m. and will feature "Chairman of the Board". There will be door prizes and hors d'oeuvres. Tickets go on sale in the University Union information desk beginning Monday Feb. 3rd. Cost per student is $7.50, which covers door prizes and Hors d'oeuvres.

In addition to entertainment by "Chairman of the Board" on campus during Homecoming, other entertainers such as "The Amateurs" and comedian Colin Quinn star of MTV's "Remote Control" will be at UNCW.

Comedian Colin Quinn will perform at University Center Ballroom, 7:30 pm on Wednesday, Feb. 12th. Advance tickets are being sold for $3.00 at the University Union information center starting Feb. 4, 1992.

"The Amateurs" will perform an outdoor concert at noon on the front lawn, Friday February 14th. The concert is free.

Williams added, "I hope some of the events planned such as the comedian, bonfire, outdoor concert, and 1st annual Homecoming parade will become traditional events during Homecoming Weeks in the future. UNCW needs to start building upon a solid basis for tradition, and hopefully my committee and I have started that tradition by providing that first stepping stone."

Williams pointed out that it is important for alumni to be at the Homecoming Dance because the Alumni Association will be giving a cash prize to the organization with the most in attendance including alumni.

Funnel Some Funding Off The Big Hill

It's probably safe to say that the North Carolina University board of governors has had to face some tough and complicated choices in governing the university system.

Lucky for them, they have an easy one coming up. The board is considering how to fund each university in the system in order to reduce redundancy in academic programs. This means deemphasizing one or two universities in the system as leaders in an academic field. That way, funding for individual academic areas won't have to be spread over 16 campuses.

That plan makes sense. After all, it would be a waste of North Carolina tax money for UNCW to begin building a major law school. There is already an excellent one just two hours up the road, in Chapel Hill.

In the same vein, it would be crazy for UNC-Chapel Hill to build a major marine science research program when UNCW's program has been nationally recognized for years; when UNCW's program includes one of only six Undersea Research Centers in the nation; when UNCW is located only minutes from the Atlantic Ocean.

The opposition to UNCW seems to be led by officials from UNC-Chapel Hill. This isn't surprising. A number of Chapel Hillians (including many of the students) have the attitude that other UNC campuses aren't worth major funding, and that any money sent to a university like UNCW is money which could be better spent somewhere near the "ell" well (or in this case, at the UNC-CH marine science facility in Morehead City). It's like they can't stand not being the leader in everything.

Well, it's time for a blow to the Tarheels' egos, and the board of governors should give it to them. UNCW deserves the lead in marine science research in the state. For fairness, Chapel Hill can keep its law school.

Keep those letters coming!

Stillborn with Bob Haywood Another Look At Columbus

From time to time this year I want to write about some information I am reading about Columbus' voyages of discovery since this is the 500th year celebration of that event. I think it's both interesting and appropriate to try to understand that event from the perspective of those who lived in the Americas before Columbus arrived. What was for white Europeans a native discovery, was for Americans an age of invasion. It seems that the Indians had a well-planned justice system and preferred their ways to the methods which European colonists imposed upon them. For instance, English settlers in North America tried to force laws regarding punishment onto the Iroquois people, to which the Iroquois are reported as replying, "Is the manner amongst us Indians, that if any such accident happens, we do redouble the life of a man that is so slain, with a hundred arrow length of beades and since you are here strangers, and come into our Country you should rather conform yourselves to the Customs of our Country than impose yours upon us."

Iroquois did not see a reason to adapt to a foreign and seemingly barbaric new order. Unlike the systems employed by the Indians, systems which emphasize equality, respect for justice and the environment, and social welfare, the European systems were militaristic, intolerant and often brutal. Yet, by force of arms the Indians were made to follow the Europeans conventions.

The militarily imposed European system of governance had a high human cost for indigenous people. One historian writes, "The Indians of the Americas totaled no less than 70 million when the foreign conquerors appeared on the horizons. In a century and a half they had been reduced to 3.5 million." These deaths were not only the result of military action but also diseases brought from Europe and harsh living conditions forced upon the Indians by the conquerors. There was evident an incredible myth of European superiority that enabled the conquerors to dismiss the tremendous cruelty occurring around them by claiming that the life of the Indians was better than it had been under the Incas and that they could not experience the liberty and civility of Europe, even if they had to be forced to that position.

Unfortunately, that same air of superiority and resultant attitude and policy continues to exist under our own present government. Present version of the myth states that the United States is an agent of justice and freedom and that US military power helps secure this order. From 1980 to 89 the United States has sent approximately $1.46 billion to central American governments in the form of military aid. And if you look at the long term effect of such aid and our repeated invasions of nations to the south of us, it is clear that US aid and military policy does not contribute greatly to

The Federal Budget. . . Who Cares?

It is a proven fact that the average American doesn't care about the federal budget deficit. Sometimes on the "NBC Nightly News," for fun, Tom Brokaw will say, "Next: the federal budget deficit." Then they'll show a 15-minute videotape, without sound, of a dog eating peanut butter. They never get a single phone call, because the instant Tom says "budget deficit," the viewers grab their remote controls and switch to sleazy tabloid shows full of "news" about Roseanne Barr Arnold's husband's tattoos and the William Kennedy Smith sex-change operation.

Of course YOU'RE different. YOU'RE not an "average American." YOU care about the issues, right?

You liar. You're not even reading this paragraph. You're saying to your spouse: "Hey, it says in the paper that William Kennedy Smith had a sex-change operation!"

Well, he didn't. I just said that to stimulate the sagging libel-suit industry, and to make the point that nobody cares about the deficit. This is good. The deficit doesn't matter.

To understand why, let's compare the U.S. government to a typical American family, headed by "John and Mary Smith," who have a combined annual income of $22,000. Let's say that the "Smiths" have drawn up a budget, listing what they want to spend in the coming year for various items such as food, housing, and court costs to have the quotation marks legally removed from their names. Let's say that this budget totals $27,000.

This means the "Smiths" have an impending budget deficit of $5,000. So what is the only logical thing for them to do? You guessed it: They should spend $30 million to build a moving sidewalk in Altona, Pa.

That's how Congress is handling it. With the federal deficit running at several hundred billion dollars per year, Congress passed a transportation bill that, according to a news report by Reed Karam of Knight-Ridder Newspapers, includes $30 million for a "high-tech" moving sidewalk in Altona, which happens to be in the district of Rep. "Bud" Shuster, the ranking Republican on the surface transportation subcommittee.

I don't know about you, but as a taxpayer, I am outraged to discover that, in this day and age, Altona residents are still being forced to walk around on regular low-tech stationary sidewalks. I'm thinking of maybe organizing a group of us to go there and carry Altonians around on our backs until they get their new sidewalk. I'm also thinking that maybe we should donate another $10 million or so to build them a high-tech computerized Spit Launcher that will fire laser-guided gobs onto the moving sidewalk, so the Altonians won't have to do this manually. "What have I done today to help keep 'Bud' Shuster in Congress?" is a question we all need to ask ourselves more often.

We also need to think about Rep. John Paul Hammerschmidt, who inserted a provision into the transportation bill to have taxpayers pay for — get ready for a crying national need — erecting signs that will identify part of U.S. 71 in Arkansas as the "John Paul Hammerschmidt Highway."

You're saying to yourself: "What? All he gets named after himself is part of one lousy highway? Can't we do MORE to recognize Rep. Hammerschmidt?" Yes, we can. We can start a nationwide movement to name things after him. Pets, for example. "Oh NO!" we could say. "Look what Rep. John Paul Hammerschmidt did on the rug! BAD Rep. John Paul Hammerschmidt!" Or: "Marge, I think it's high time that we had Rep. John Paul Hammerschmidt sprayed."

I don't mean to single out Bud and John Paul. The transportation bill had over $5 billion worth of special local projects and favors attached to it, lamprey-like, by various congresspersons. But this is good, because these projects will CREATE JOBS. See, when the GOVERNMENT spends money, it creates jobs; whereas when the money is left in the hands of TAXPAYERS, God only knows what they do with it. Bake it into pies, probably. Anything to avoid creating jobs.

That's why President George "Samurai" Bush flew all the way to Euless, Tex., a round trip of 2,600 miles, at taxpayers' expense, so he could be seen on TV signing the transportation bill at a highway construction site. "Jobs, jobs, jobs," he said, in a quotation that will probably win the award for Best Articulated Reason For Signing A Big Fat Lardbucket Of A Transportation Bill, narrowly edging out "Wooga, wooga, wooga."

Of course eventually, down the federally financed road, all this money will have to be repaid, with interest, by somebody. Our kids, in fact. Should we worry about this? Are we placing an unfair burden on them? Nah. Maybe they'll be poor, but any time they want, they'll be able to hitchhike to Altona and ride the sidewalk. The lucky little Hammerschmidts.

Here's What I'd Like To See In 1992

I know it's a bit late for an "I'd like to see in 1992..." column, but, considering the amount of money I'm paid, I'd like to present my first annual "I'd like to see in 1992..." column. Of course, this will be the only "I'd like to see in 1992..." column because next year's will be the first annual "I'd like to see in 1993..." column.

So, without further doo-doo, I'd like to present my first annual "I'd like to see in 1992..." column.

I'd like to see in 1992:
-the UNC school system realize the best place for the main marine biology program is the school by the sea. (Despite the fact I'm an English major, I see the logic in putting a marine biology program next to an ocean.)

-this university be one of the first campuses in the country to go public with its rape problem. If one occurs on campus, word must get out. This will keep women from getting a false sense of security, and get men to keep an eye out for possible attackers. We have to let the country know that rapes will not be tolerated on the campus of UNCW.

-an advertiser on one of the local radio stations that carries UNCW sports to say, "Hey, we don't care about the sports. We only want your money!"

-some waiters in this area to realize a tip is not guaranteed. If a patron asks for no tomatoes on his burger and gets some, don't be surprised to find no tip.

-the students of UNCW support women's sports half as much as they do men's.

-the American people realize the Japanese official's comment about American laziness applies just as much or more so to the white-collar workers. Though unions have had some effect on the cost of labor, the short-sightedness of the bigwigs has left this country the way it is.

-someone explain to me why gym classes (archery, tennis, etc.) are needed in a college education. —restaurants actually charge what a cup of ice and a carbonated beverage actually cost, plus ten cents.

-people realize Oliver Stone's "JFK" was not completely honest. Though the case should be reopened, he himself manipulated facts to make a better movie. Then he had the audacity to hypocritically say the media can't report the facts correctly.

-everybody listen to Louis Armstrong's "What A Wonderful World" once a day.

-everybody who has given up on love give it another shot. The world seems better when everyone has that goofy grin on his face.

-Democratic candidates be given an equal chance in the media.

-teachers be paid what they are worth in comparison to others in society. If Darryl Strawberry is worth $3 million a year, then my English professors are worth a cool $5 million each. (I'm not sucking up, I just want to be their agent.)

-nonconformists who hang out with other nonconformists realize they are actually conforming to "nonconformist" ways.

-guys who use their cars as phallic symbols and spin their tires for no apparent reason in apartment parking lots at noon on a school day lose control and hit a few cars. Just so they have to explain to everyone why they were being so stupid.

-people think about what I wrote (typed) here. I don't expect everyone to accept or support what I have to say, but I would like for the readers to form an opinion and respond. If we all did that with our political choices, we could rid ourselves of our stagnant government and elect people who best represent our views, not the person whose name we saw most often in October.

Scared Of The Ozone Hole

"We're all dead meat."

I recognized the voice even before I turned to see my friend approaching the table where I sat. I had been waiting for him in the Center Stage Cafe. He was seldom late for the pizza buffet. But today was the exception. He had not been the same since I left him in the parking lot that day, although he does say he forgives me. Caffeine deprivation does strange things to a person, and he said he understood. I pushed aside the greasy stained pizza plates and motioned for him to sit.

"That's about the size of it, at least as I see it," he said. "On the 6:00 news the other night, I heard the death knell. Another hole appears to be forming in the ozone over the other pole soon, and the existing one is still growing. Meanwhile, air conditioners, refrigeration units, and automobiles continue to pump CFC's into the chemical soup that used to be our atmosphere."

"At the same time, deforestation is going on strong. The bulldozer and the chain saw are clearing swathes of trees for such important facilities as sports arenas and luxury hotels. In other areas, they are cutting out centuries old stands of lumber to ship overseas where other countries have already used up all their trees. You would think people would learn from the desert cultures in the mid-east, that trees are a finite resource. Once they're gone, you can build out of stone and you can burn dung, but what do you use to recycle CO₂ when we're done with it? What will we do to keep the earth we are standing on, that our condos are built on from washing away?"

I said nothing as I got up and walked back to the pizza bar. I wished the big screen was working, so I could be hypnotized by MTV images. When I returned, he seemed not to have even noticed my absence. He continued as if I had never left.

"I say the Human race has had it. There's no need in continuing the pointless talks about how to save it. They have talked too long. The only thing all that talking has produced is a lot more carbon dioxide, and we've already been through that bit. They talk about creating new refrigerants which won't give off CFC's. They talk about electric cars and solar power to light our homes. They talk about this and that, but they are only talking."

"It's too late to get serious though. It won't do any good to create all these horrendous things now. Even if they are created, who is going to enact a law that will make people use them instead of the old things? It would be political suicide, and anybody knows a politician would rather bring down the entire race than do something that would affect his chances of re-election. Strange, that they can't see far enough ahead to realize that one day there won't be anyone left to vote for them anyhow. No matter though, because they too will have been reduced to big feasting inanimates."

"I don't want to be a micro meal!" I offered, trying to bring a little levity to the depressing soliloquy. No good.

"You know?" he said, ignoring my feeble attempt. "I always figured the Human race was doomed. I mean, how long could we survive if it weren't for our technology? Now we've technologized ourselves to death. On top of that, it looks like we might have pulled down the rest of the inhabitants of this planet with us. That's what is so sad. I mean, it's not so bad that we have to go. But why should we have destroyed everything else along with ourselves?"

"It kind of makes you think. If there is a higher being that created us, then we were probably just a failed experiment, and he's moved on to other things. If we were really still concerned about our welfare, why didn't he just send down a plague or something and wipe out all the scientists at the beginning of the atomic age? Or, even better, he should have done something at the beginning of the industrial revolution."

I squirmed in my seat. Now would be a really good time to be locked in on swaying feminine forms in a heavy metal video or something. I picked at the pizza bones on my plate, trying to act unaffected by the bent of this one sided discussion. I was about to give up all hope when I spotted a favorite professor walking from the post office. "Look man, can you toss these plates for me?" I stood quickly, nearly knocking the remnants of my drink off the table. He seemed not to notice. "I've got to go check on something with Dr. ———. I'll catch you later!"

I'm not sure, but I thought I heard him still talking as I ran out into the hallway.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dear Editor,

The trickle down effect of large-scale budget cutting has reached frightening proportions. Teachers who find themselves in a classroom without chalk must requisition it from their own respective departments, regardless of whether their classrooms are on the same floor or not.

It happened last week, in my early morning class. The teacher ran out of chalk. I offered to get some for her, so she could continue her lecture. My first thought was to quickly grab some from a nearby classroom, but they were all occupied; so I ran to the department office on the same floor. The secretary, sympathetically, handed me two pieces of chalk, which I handed over to my waiting teacher. So far so good. It seemed like no more than a common minor crisis, easily amended, and we were back to business as usual. I would not have lost another thought about it, had not this seemingly trivial event been indelibly marked in my mind by what happened next.

Two hours later. Another class. Another room, same floor, same teacher -- "déjà vu" -- no chalk. I already knew where to get some, so off I went again to the same department office. I should not have been quite so confident. This time my request was countered with an interrogation: "Another piece of chalk? Which classroom? Who is your teacher?" I answered honestly and quickly. I knew the teacher and the class were waiting. "Same teacher?" It must have sounded very suspicious. Who knows what she might be doing with all this chalk? "She will have to get her chalk from her own department upstairs." I begged, I pleaded, and I promised to have it returned after class. Reluctantly, she handed over a single piece of chalk. Somehow, I felt sorry for her. I ran back and delivered the chalk. If there is one thing I will never forget about my days at UNCW, it will be that face (and the comment) of my teacher when I told her she had to replace the borrowed piece of chalk after class.

Dear Editor,

I enjoyed Carole Mehle's recent article on the SGA Bookstore and would like to offer a few suggestions on how this operation might turn things around and make a profit. The article addressed the fact that it lost $1200 so far, and pointed out where the money earned was used for salaries for the workers in the store, publicity, office supplies and "insurance to cover stolen books just in case".

Why not consider having the Cameron School of Business furnish student workers to run the Bookstore as a classroom project? This would eliminate the need to pay office salaries and in turn would furnish the students with a real experience in retail sales. They would get college credit and learn how business actually works vs. theoretical text book situations. The accounting could be done by students as a project and grades given by the professor.

Now before anyone thinks this can't be done by students as part of their learning experience, stop to consider what the School of Education has been doing to Education Majors for years. Each year they send out student teachers for a full semester without pay, to work in the public schools to gain "on the job" experience. In addition the student still has to pay UNCW their semester fees. Think about it, maybe the time has come for the college to get the students out learning what it's like in the real business world.

Very truly yours,
Mike Keane

Love Letter To A Friend

Dear Magic,

Dylan Thomas once wrote about a dying light. This light represented the passing of an age, the end of a life where darkness finally triumphed and the spirit moved to a higher plain. This is an event we should try to savor off for as long as possible, for often man doesn't appreciate life until faced with losing it.

Thomas said, "to rebel against, to battle, to rage, rage against the dying of the light."

Of course in the poem Thomas was pleading with his father who was ill and quickly dying, but the meaning of the poem could be addressed to whether you should play in this weekend's All-Star game.

You retired from the Los Angeles Lakers Nov. 7, announcing you had contracted the HIV virus that causes AIDS. This is a terrible blow to any living person, but devastating to a prime athlete who was still at the top of his game.

We have all felt badly for you, wishing you well in your life fight and cheered your attitude to address the AIDS issue straight on as a spokesman.

Your charming personality and god-like status to kids as a professional athlete will serve you well in getting your safe sex message across to the youth and adults of America.

We've applauded your bravery, stamina, positive attitude, and basketball ability, but it's time to get off the stage. The '92 NBA All-Star Game is not the place for you.

Sure, you received the second highest All-Star fan ballot votes in the West Conference. Portland Trailblazer Clyde Drexler was first.

It was really a sentimental choice by the fans, a curtain call, to a great player, who along with Larry Bird picked up a troubled league, the NBA, and changed it into a billion dollar business. Their vote was a thank-you, a gift for the decade of great basketball you have brought to them. Magic, that favor should be returned with a no.

And Yes, NBA commissioner David Stern, made an additional spot for you on the West team. Some people may say it was a generous offer that shouldn't be turned down, but the fact is it should.

Think about it, why wouldn't Stern give you a chance to play. Remember, it was your charisma both on and off the field that made the then-new commissioner one of the most successful presidents in professional sports history.

He is sitting on top of the world. He has made his money off you, and would cash in even more with a last hurrah visit.

It's like parading a sideshow act. Come see the Aids Man before he dies. Oh Magic, Please, "Don't Go Gentle In That Good Night."

You are better than this.

I know this hurts. You probably believe you have a few more years left in this league; and I would incline to agree, but that choice is not yours anymore. The doctors have said that to prolong playing the game at the professional level will speed up the virus in you. That means you die quicker and I know you don't want this.

"Don't Go Gentle In That Good Night."

Life is precious, don't throw it away for a last taste of glory. Let's be fair. You've had your moments on the court. These memories will last in everyone's minds for a long time. Leave the game as you entered it, as a gentleman. Let the active players take part in one of sports most exciting and awe-inspiring spectacles. You don't belong here anymore, you left it this November afternoon.

It's tough. I know. You feel fine. I'm sure you could compete with these 40 or more NBA stars, but it's not your time anymore. Showtime has officially closed down in L.A. after 11 seasons. The fat broad has sang, its time to move on.

You point out that you are still active, listed on the Lakers injury-report. But, Magic this is just another tribute. The Lakers are thanking you for leading them to five World Titles in the last 11 years. The team is additionally retiring your number later this month, an action you object too.

I can understand that. You don't want to be declared dead yet. You are, as Thomas said, "Raging Against The Light."

That's O.K.! Having HIV doesn't kill you but playing basketball at that level will. I'm not talking one game but I know you. You won't stop there, you'll continue to push on.

If you must play, participate in the Legends game. It is where retired athletes like you can strut your stuff. Your presence would add some class and excitement to the contest. It would also allow you the glory you seek again.

However, the safest move is not to play at all. You know deep down that the ends and the means are not balanced in your favor. No basketball game is worth throwing away a lifetime.

So Magic, I ask you, as writer, a fan, and a well-wisher to "Rage Against The Dying Of The Light," to continue your fight against this horrible disease and teach others how to avoid it.

But, cancel your bid to play. Your professional basketball career is over, except it. And in this instance...

"Do Go Gentle Into That Good Night."

If the Seahawk women's basketball team continue their losing streak they will break the school record. The '91 team set the record last season with 19 defeats. Currently the '92 team has lost 16 straight with nine more games on their schedule. The team could break the mark the earliest, Feb. 13 in a home contest against Campbell.

'Hawks Break ECU's Dominance

BY DAVID BARNHARDT
Staff Writer

UNCW's men's and women's swim teams ended their losing tradition against East Carolina University Saturday at Trask Natatorium. These matches marked the first time the Seahawks have won a dual meet against the Pirates in thirteen tries. The men won their meet 132-111, and the women were victorious by 158-83 count.

"I am extremely pleased with this win," UNCW coach Dave Allen said, "because we set this as a goal at the beginning of the season."

"We got great leadership from captains in this meet."

The Seahawks won the 400 medley relay, 50 freestyle, 200 individual medley, 400 freestyle, 400 backstroke, and the 800 breaststroke. Freshman Steve Burke won both the one and three meter diving competitions.

Senior Brad Kinkema also had a strong meet for UNCW, winning all three events he swam in.

The North Canton, Ohio product took firsts in both the 200 breaststroke and 50 free event and was part of the victorious 400 medley relay team.

The Seahawk swimmers are hoping this win will propel them to a conference title.

"ECU was our biggest obstacle in the conference, so we're looking forward to winning the conference title."

Junior swimmer Mark Alford

"ECU was our biggest obstacle in the conference," junior freestyle specialist Mark Alford said, "so now we're looking forward to winning the conference title."

In the women's meet, UNCW won all but three matches. The Seahawks were led by both their veterans and their freshmen.

Senior Laura Doepf and junior Amy Lewis, both co-captains of the women's team, picked up four wins for UNCW between them. Lewis won the 200 individual medley, 200 backstroke events, and was part of the Seahawk winning 400 medley relay team.

Doepf, meanwhile, took top honors in the 200 freestyle.

Freshmen Karla Zick and Stephanie Plifka pulled their weight too. Zick captured the 500 freestyle race and was part of the winning 400 medley relay team.

Plifka won the 200 fly competition and was part of the second place 400 relay squad of Doepf, Zick, and Alison Hayden. Rookie diver, Kelli Sutton also won both one and three meter diving competitions.

The Seahawks' next meet is Saturday against George Washington University at Trask Natatorium. The meet begins at 1 p.m.

'Hawks Fall Again, Winless in 16 Tries

BY JIM CLARK
Assistant Sports Editor

For 35 minutes the Lady Seahawks played neck and neck with the East Carolina University Lady Pirates, then ECU's Gaynor O'Donnell took over.

She scored 12 of her game-high 27 in the final seven minutes, giving ECU the spark it needed to cruise to an 88-73 victory Saturday at Trask Coliseum.

"We didn't keep the ball from O'Donnell," Seahawk coach Sheri Tynes said. "She didn't miss in the second half." O'Donnell scored 19 points in the first half.

The game was close until the final five minutes. ECU led 70-63 when UNCW had what Tynes calls one of the team's "frequent mental lapses."

Sophomore Kim Bush scored UNCW's final five points in the last 38 seconds to narrow the margin.

Four Seahawks finished in double-figures in scoring, led by sophomore Pat Martin's 18 points and 11 rebounds.

Sophomores Zandra Harris and Lorraine Cordaway, and freshman Myra Horton each finished with 15 points.

Horton had a perfect shooting game. She made all three of her shots from the field, including a three-pointer, and eight for eight from the free throw line.

Saturday's game marked the fifth time this year that the Lady Seahawks out-rebounded their opponent. After Martin's team-high 11, freshman Hannah Grady pulled down nine in 17 minutes of play.

Last year's Colonial Athletic Association's Women's player of the year, ECU's Tonya Hagrove finished with 21 points and 15 rebounds. With this loss the Lady Seahawks fell to 9-16 overall and 0-7 in the CAA. Next up for the Lady Hawks are conference rivals James Madison University on Saturday and the University of Richmond on Monday.

Lady Seahawk Pat Martin scored 18 points in a 88-73 loss to ECU.

UNCW lost to both teams, 91-68 and 93-54, respectively the first time through the conference schedule. Both games are scheduled to begin at 7 p.m. at Trask Coliseum.

Tynes hopes the ECU loss will finally drive home the point she has been preaching all year.

"I thought we had learned our lesson on the good of playing for 40 minutes. Hopefully the breakdown won't be recurring."

Tynes is looking forward to this weekend.

"JMU has a young team and they are struggling a bit. We're playing better, so we should do well against them," she said after Monday's practice.

"We were non-existent the last time we played Richmond. I don't think that will happen again."

UNCW Cagers Split Weekend Games

BY PATRICK FOWLER
Sports Editor

Streaks are the name of the game in collegiate athletics as one can go from hot to cold in a matter of minutes. For the Seahawks Saturday afternoon, it was the first 20 minutes or half of play against East Carolina.

UNCW shot 40 percent from the field and missed key short-ranged shots as the Pirates routed them 80-65 in front of home crowd of 3,500.

"The ECU game wasn't a letdown for us," UNCW assistant basketball coach Jeff Reynolds said. "We just missed some easy shots."

The Pirates, led by '91 CAA Rookie-of-the-Year Lester Lyons's game-high 18 points, used their quickness to counteract the Seahawk height inside. ECU blazed the net early hitting 18 of their 34 shot attempts for a 53 shooting percentage and ran out to an early seven point lead. The Pirates pulled the lead throughout the half pushing the lead to eleven points at halftime, 41-30. Good free-throw shooting by the Seahawks prevented the halftime deficit from being higher.

"ECU played one of our better games against us, no doubt about it," Reynolds said, "but we still didn't execute our game like we should have."

Senior center Matt Fish had one of his worst outings of his career, scoring only four points on just four shot attempts. The Washington, Iowa product, who has averaged 17.2 points per game this season, could not find his rhythm against the Pirates' defense and had trouble coping with ECU's speedy guards.

"Matt was due for a bad game," Reynolds said.

"He's been scoring in double figures all season, he was bound to have a letdown."

Fish's off-day and the Seahawks' trouble with hitting the short shot plagued UNCW in the second half as the team shot 34 percent from the field, despite hitting four out of ten three-pointers.

Monday night's contest with Davidson, however, was a different story. The Seahawks bounced back quickly from the ECU contest hitting 51 percent from the field, as UNCW downed the Wildcats, 71-68, on two of Mark Eaton's free-throws with 11 seconds remaining.

"You're going against the best in the league. Playing a team like that you have to hope they have a below average game and you have an above average one."

UNCW coach Kevin Eastman

"It was a good win on the road in February," UNCW head coach Kevin Eastman said. "The win puts us back on track. We played well, not great, but our defense did a nice job for us. Mark (Eaton), Reggie (Venev), Tim (Shaw), and Chris (Meighen) defended extremely well."

UNCW, down one at halftime, went back to their inside game against a smaller Davidson club as Fish reached his double digit average again, pouring in 18 points. Eaton, who scored 15 points in the loss to ECU, added 17 and recent injury-recovered junior Keith Adkins threw in 12.

"We tried to get him (Fish) going early,"

Eastman said. "He was more aggressive on the board this game."

UNCW had leads of five and seven for most of the second period, but a furious Wildcat comeback over the final 2:41 minutes of the contest pulled Davidson within one, twice, 62-61 with 2:10 left and 68-69 with 13 seconds remaining. However, steady foul shooting by UNCW guards Venev, Eaton, and Adkins gave the Seahawks the win.

"They were shooting unbelievable shots at the end," Eastman said. "On two of them, I'm sure that the shooter couldn't see the basket. But, we knew we had to win the game with our free throws and our guys made their shots."

Davidson Janko Nurut led all scorers with 23 points.

The Seahawks (9-10 overall, and 2-5 in the CAA) go on the road for two conference game clashes. UNCW faces a hot-shooting James Madison squad on Saturday.

The Dukes (14-5, 7-0) lead the conference by two games after spanking second-placed Richmond by 16, 61-45, on the Spiders' home floor. UNCW lost to JMU, Jan. 11, 87-68.

"You're going against the best in the league," Eastman said. "Playing a team like that you have to hope they have an above average game and you have an above-average one."

"We can't allow Calisto (Kest) to get free looks at the basket like he was getting down here. Edwagale (Byran), their best scorer, is another one we have to watch."

UNCW battles Richmond on Monday. The Seahawks look to the Spiders, 82-73, Jan. 13. Tip-off for both contests is 7:30 p.m.

Homecoming Quinn Cancels Comedy Show

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

Colin Quinn, star of MTV's "Remote Control," cancelled his Wednesday performance, which was part of Homecoming '92 festivities. In his place, comedian Billy Jaye performed. Because of Quinn's cancellation, Jaye's performance, sponsored by the Association for Campus Entertainment, was free to students. Admission to the Quinn show was planned to be $3.

Quinn called ACE Chairman Shanda Williams Tuesday night to say he was cancelling. "Colin is really sick with the flu," Williams said. "He was very nice and sincere about it. He sent a card and he called. He said he would call and find out how homecoming went."

Jaye performed because of a condition in Quinn's contract. If Quinn was unable to perform, his agency would supply a replacement, Williams said.

Frank Tascone, student activities advisor, said that the cancellation made the show cheaper. Quinn's fee for the appearance was $4000 plus expenses, and Jaye's is a flat $2500. ACE also got a refund on Quinn's plane ticket, which avoided a loss of over $1000.

Williams said Jaye's name "may not be as well known as Colin's but I'm sure he is just as good."

Jaye has appeared in the movie Billy Bathgate, a movie that was filmed in Wilmington, and on MTV's "Half Hour Comedy Hour."

Quinn, who will be filming a movie in the area expressed interest in doing something for the students, Williams said. "There is a chance he might. We're not sure, but he said that he wanted to do something. He felt really bad about having to cancel," she said.

Payment for advance tickets will be refunded Friday at the University Union information center. Students who want a refund should bring their ID's and the tickets.

Witness Testimony Large Factor In Tyson Conviction

BY LARRY TYE
Boston Globe

While the outcomes couldn't have been more different, analysts say the trials of Mike Tyson and William Kennedy Smith had one decisive characteristic in common:

Both high-profile rape cases turned on who was more believable, the accused or the accuser.

"Tyson's accuser was much more persuasive and Tyson was much less so than the parties in State of Florida vs. William Kennedy Smith," said William Bopp, a criminologist at Florida Atlantic University who was closely involved with both cases.

"People look at William Kennedy Smith and say, 'He doesn't seem like the kind of person who would do something like that,'" said Bopp. "They look at Mike Tyson and have the inclination that he's capable of such violence. He's a boxer and a rough-beaten guy and uneducated."

"They can talk about the issue being consent all they want, but the issue is perception on the part of jurors."

While that might seem fair on first glance, Bopp cautioned that at times such a decision process can have tragic consequences. That, he explained, is because "the more convincing and more

It came down to "whom do you trust."

articulate person is considered to be the most credible person and that just does not necessarily follow."

Sтивен Brill, founder of the cable station Court TV, agreed that the key issue in the Tyson case came down to "whom do you trust." The jury in Indiana, he added, reached a decidedly different answer to that question than the one in Smith's trial last December in West Palm Beach, Fla., which is why Tyson was convicted of rape and deviate conduct.

Another key difference between the two cases, he said, is that Tyson's lawyers "were a lot less effective than Roy Black," the soft-spoken Miami attorney who gained national prominence through his successful defense of Smith.

Did the fact that Smith was white and came from a wealthy, politically powerful family influence his acquittal? And did Tyson's being black, and from a background of poverty, make a jury more disposed to convict him?

Clearly Tyson's race, and his profession as a boxer, worked against him — especially in a conservative state, Bopp said. But he and Brill agreed that the role of race was diminished because Tyson's accuser also was black.

Those analysts and others insist, however, that Smith's prominence, along with the fact that he was a doctor and made an articulate, compassionate witness, dramatically improved his prospects with the jury that decided his fate. Smith, who is Sen. Edward Kennedy's nephew, was acquitted on charges that he raped a Florida woman at his family's Palm Beach estate on Easter weekend.

Despite those distinctions, the oft-repeated comparisons between the Smith and Tyson cases are easy to understand and in some respects seem compelling: Both involved charges of rape filed against public figures. Both defendants allegedly had a history of sexual misdeeds and supposedly used their prominence to satisfy their sexual appetites, while both accusers were said to have encouraged the sexual advances.

And both cases came at a time

Consignment Bookstore Figures In

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

The final figures from the Student Government Association consignment bookstore are back and they show that the store's total expenses were $1726.78. They took in 630 books and sold 277.

Books that were not returned to the students during the designated pick-up time will be donated to an undetermined charity.

Christy Gunnell, chairman of the bookstore, said in a speech to the SGA senate, "A big part of this (the expenses) was set-up costs for the store stamps and (cash) drawers."

Gunnell said that the figures for the store's first venture were lower than the SGA had hoped for, but that that would change with time. "We received lots of good suggestions and a lot of people said that they would support the program again. I feel it is a good program."

Also reported by Gunnell was a meeting she has scheduled with Arnold Siko, manager of the University Bookstore, and Director of Auxiliary Services Charlie Maimone. The purpose of this meeting is to discuss the two bookstores working together. Maimone said that he understands the policy. "If I could buy a book for a cheaper price than the bookstore had it for, I probably would. If I could get a book that sold for $7.50 used at the bookstore for $6, I would buy it."

What we at the bookstore want is the students to know that with our bookstore, they know what they are getting, when they will get it and how much they can get it for. If the student store doesn't have it, we do and they can come get it from us."

Gunnell also reported to the senate that they were able to give one student back approximately $160 for books.

Students have been receiving their checks for books sold at the SGA bookstore in their mailboxes. Anyone that has not received their refund for a sold book should inquire at the SGA Office, room 200, University Union.

Live A Day In The Life Of A Prof

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

If you've ever wondered what it's like to be a faculty member, now you can find out. "Be A Faculty Member For A Day" is a new program that is in the planning stages in committees of the Student Government Association.

Another program that the SGA is working on is a poll of the "Best Faculty Member."

The "Be a Faculty Member" program is a program that would enable a student to live a day in the life of a faculty member along with that faculty member. "It is available to everyone to see what is done," said Victor Brown, SGA senator and member of the committee. "We hope that the faculty will get something out of the program too, a personal rather than a professional relationship with the student that participates."

"We hope that the faculty will get something out of the program too..."

The program will be ongoing, said Joe Mitchell, student service coordinator. "We hope that a faculty member will choose to do it once every two to two and a half months — not just one day. The program will be available whenever the faculty can do it."

Mitchell said he hopes the program will be run similar to SGA's "Take A Faculty Member To Lunch" program.

Information will be sent to department heads and staff within the next week, Mitchell said.

Another program that is being planned, as well, is a survey to see who, in the students opinion is the "Best Faculty Member." The program will award $500 to the winning faculty member. "I'm sending a memo to groups and we hope to get a response from the organizations on campus, but I'm leaving it up to the students," said Ivy Chalmers, SGA senator and committee member.

The nominations will start as soon as Chalmers can get the form drawn up. The deadline for nominations is Feb. 27.

With the nominations, Chalmers said that she will draw up a list and the results will be known after the election in March.

Interested students can stop by the SGA Office, University Union, room 200, for more information or nomination forms.

Girls Face Gender Bias

BY MURIEL COHEN
Boston Globe

BOSTON — From their very first days in school, U.S. girls face a drumbeat of gender bias, ranging from sexual harassment to discrimination in curriculum to lack of attention from teachers, according to a survey released Wednesday in Washington.

As a result, girls suffer from diminished self-esteem, do not perform as well as boys in school, particularly in math and science, and limit their career options, according to the survey, sponsored by the American Association of University Women, an organization representing faculty members and administrators.

The study, a scathing indictment of gender bias in U.S. schools, was presented Wednesday to major education organizations, including the National School Boards Association, as the women's association presses for elimination of gender discrimination in U.S. education. The organization wants its recommendations for change to be incorporated in national, state and local school-reform efforts, said project director Susan Bailey of the Wellesley (Mass.) Center for Research on Women.

"Much has to be done at the local level, and the AAUW will publish action guides for its local chapters," said Bailey, principal author of the report, which synthesized scores of studies on the education of girls.

The AAUW is calling for enactment and enforcement of policies against sexual harassment; stricter enforcement of Title IX, the federal law that prohibits discrimination in educational institutions; and revision of curriculum to emphasize the experiences of girls and women.

"Schools must take the education of girls and young women seriously, and that has not been done," Bailey said in a telephone interview from Washington.

She said that there has been some progress in the 20 years since Congress passed Title IX but that equity has not yet been achieved.

"Construction of the glass ceiling begins not in the executive suite but in the classroom," said Alice McKee, president of the AAUW Educational Foundation, which funded the study.

"It starts in preschool, when girls get less teacher attention and lessons focus on the developmental needs of boys," she said. "By the time girls reach high school, they have been systematically tracked toward traditional, sex-segregated jobs, away from areas of study that lead to high-paying jobs in science, technology and engineering."

"America cannot afford to squander half its talent."

The study indicates that girls and boys enter school roughly equal in ability. Twelve years later, however, girls have fallen behind in key areas.

In discussing gender bias in SAT scores, the study reported, "If a mathematics test emphasizes: computation, logic and combined arithmetic and algebra skills, girls will do better. If the test emphasizes word problems and combined arithmetic and geometry skills, boys will do better. The emphasis test developers place on one area or another area can increase or decrease gender differences."

The study noted that although most elementary teachers are women, many discriminate against girls. In part because the bias pattern is established by superintendents and administrators, the majority of them male.

All teachers tend to pay more attention to boys in class and to give them more encouragement, the study said. For example, if boys called out, the teachers listened. When girls called out, they were often told to raise their hands if they want to speak.

Research also indicates that educators from the preschool level and beyond tend to choose classroom activities that appeal to boys and to select presentation formats in which boys excel.

The study also said reports of boys' sexually harassing girls in schools are increasing. It attributed the problem in part to attitudes that "boys will be boys."

These school experiences dramatically lower girls' self-esteem and shape their career decisions, the association found.

Disproportionately low numbers of girls are heading to math and science careers even if they perform well in high school. A striking example comes from a Rhode Island study of seniors in which 64 percent of the boys who had taken physics and calculus were planning a major in science or engineering in college while only 18 percent of the girls in the same courses were opting for those majors.

To combat these problems, the AAUW will ask support for: —Strengthening Title IX, with particular attention on how schools handle pregnant teenagers.

—Requiring administrators, teachers and counselors to incorporate gender issues in curriculum.

—Helping girls develop a positive self-image.

—Increasing funding to support research and development of gender-equal, multi-cultural curriculum, including issues of violence against women.

—Encouraging girls to study math and science to enhance career opportunities.

—Eliminating gender bias in vocational education.

—Developing gender-neutral tests.

According to the report, there already are teaching methods that could lower or eliminate gender gaps in math and science. For example, girls perform better in a cooperative atmosphere and in classrooms in which all students are questioned rather than only the most aggressive.

Nudity Is Business As Usual In Florida Beach Towns

BY DONNA ST. GEORGE
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — The waitress who pours coffee shimmies her breasts at the morning crowd. The scrubman at the carwash struts through keds in a G-string. The hot dog lady peddles franks — and shows off her bums.

Even maids who mop and vacuum here don't frilly negligees.

This isn't a risqué movie script — it's real life in South Florida, where bareness abounds as never before.

Well, not for everyone.

"I haven't heard of topless attorneys or CPAs yet," says Dennis Grady, executive director of the Chamber of Commerce of the Palm Beaches.

In the sunny warmth of Broward and Palm Beach counties, clothes are coming off in the unlikelyst places: in the hair salon, the doughnut shop, during home-cleaning visits, even at a check-cashing window.

It's an idea that's been around forever but has really taken hold here in the last year or so, as small businesses look for new gimmicks and adult clubs try to keep their customers interested.

But be warned, this eye-opening craze is not for the faint-hearted. There is a vociferous conservative faction in this palm-studded resort land, where Prince Charles plays polo and sex is always making headlines.

Palm Beach County is where the Kennedys had their ill-fated Good Friday fling, and neighboring Broward is where Kathy Willetts, wife of a sheriff's deputy, said she turned to prostitution with prominent men to ease her nymphomania.

Already, the added bareness in small business has stirred such a fuss that Palm Beach County passed a law Jan. 28 mandating that hot dog vendors such as Gloria Gonzalez put their clothes back on.

Or else build four-foot enclosures around their hot dog stands to keep their curves under wrap.

"I'll continue — even if it goes up to the Supreme Court," vows Gonzalez, 26, a shapely 107-pound vendor who sells $2 hot dogs wearing a thong bikini that, pieced together, might make a square foot of clothing.

The notion of showing more to sell more struck Gonzalez by accident — after her swimsuit shrunk in the wash and came out looking like a thong. The one-time secretary wore it anyway — and presto, she sold more hot dogs than ever.

"Every business has a marketing concept, and this is mine," says Gonzalez, explaining that skimpy suits are as natural to Florida as oranges and alligators.

"Tourists think it's so cute," she says. "They don't think it's immoral. They think this is Florida. They say, 'Up North we have fat old men with proboscises selling hot dogs.'"

Gonzalez's success inspired other women to vend, and last summer nearly a dozen scantily clad peddlers worked roadsides in Palm Beach County, including two women who wore pasties.

All of which led, of course, to a storm of outrage and political pressure.

The county responded by ordering engineers to do a traffic study. The mission: see whether Gloria Gonzalez causes accidents.

After three separate surveys, engineers found no hazard.

Drivers slowed down when they saw her, says Barry Silver, her lawyer. "If the county's interest is public safety, it should require the thong at every intersection," he says.

Had, instead, the county looked for other ways to force Gonzalez into more clothing — and thus, the law was conceived.

"I hate to make the pun but the statute is narrowly tailored," says county attorney Lee Rosenthal. "All she has to do is dress in a French-cut bikini rather than a thong or a G-string."

Gonzalez says it's out of the question — and she expects to be arrested when the law takes effect, within two weeks. That means she'll go to court, with the help of the American Civil Liberties Union, where a judge will decide whether she must cover her behind.

All told, Gonzalez has become the most celebrated in the new generation of businesses in the buff — because she's out in public, which means stricter laws.

But inside garages and stores and salons, she has company.

There's the topless Hands On Car Wash, which opened in Fort Lauderdale last year with a crew of bare-breasted women in thong bikini bottoms. Just last week, it expanded its offerings.

Now, for $20 and a minimum $5 tip, a driver may choose among washers: men in G-strings, women in thong bottoms, or both. The driver sits seated in the car for a 15-minute spectacle of soapy water and sexy moves.

The inside windows are known to get steamy. "Most of the customers are surprised — that we do a good job," says Valerie Grandy, a smiling blonde of 27.

In August, the carwash was named the "best hand job in South Florida" by South Florida magazine, which mused: "We bet some of those cars aren't even dirty."

Gay Bashing Tests Speech Limits

BY JEFF GOTTLEB
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

STANFORD, Calif. — The night of Jan. 19, Stanford University law student Keith Rabois and two friends were walking through Otero Hall on their way to a party.

Rabois, no friend of the faculty member who runs the 90-person dormitory, shouted toward the man's apartment what he admits was something like, "Faggot! Hope you die of AIDS! Can't wait 'til you die, faggot."

The incident, which didn't become public until the dean of students wrote a letter to the campus newspaper last week, has united the tightly knit law school in almost total condemnation of the 22-year-old Rabois.

Since the incident became public, Rabois said, he has not spoken in class. But when he does, several students said, they expect his comments will receive hisses.

"He's abused the privilege of being part of this cooperative community," said Christy Haubegger, senior editor of the Stanford Law Review.

Rabois, perhaps Stanford's best-known conservative student, said he intended to make a provocative statement in order to expand the boundaries of acceptable comments at the school.

Many of his fellow law students and the dean of students, though, don't think Rabois' comments were premeditated. They say his newfound concern with the 1st Amendment is a smoke screen to excuse loathsome behavior — behavior not so different from the opinions he often expressed in his column in a conservative campus weekly as an undergraduate.

About 450 students, faculty and staff at the law school have signed a petition condemning Rabois' activities. The signers include law school Dean Paul Brest and several prominent professors, including constitutional law expert Gerald Gunther.

About 100 people have written comments on a 4- by 6-foot, neon-yellow poster hanging in the law school's student lounge. The poster, which includes a photo of Rabois, says, "Exercise your right to free speech. Tell this law student what you think of his behavior. It may be legal but it isn't right."

Alison Tucher, the law student who put up the poster, wrote, "Forget your (constitutional) law professor, didn't your mother teach you not to talk like that?" Another student wrote, "Very brave of you, Keith. Let's see you try something that really takes nerve, like dealing with different types of people." Dean Brest wrote, "I believe that civilized society defends an individual's willingness not to do everything that is their legal right to do."

Even Rabois' fellow conservatives have backed away from him. "We think what Keith said was rude, that it was a foolish thing to say, and I think we basically think it was wrong," said Peter Thiel, president of the Federalist Society, a group of conservative law students.

Rabois said he expected the hostility because he was opposing the university's liberal orthodoxy. "That's the whole point," he said. "If they can make me look like a pariah, imagine what it will do to deter other people from speaking." But the criticism has gone beyond fliers, petitions and posters. Rabois said he receives one or two threatening phone calls a day, including death threats.

He said he was the victim of a conspiracy by vengeful university officials tired of reading his policies promoting multiculturalism, allowing gay couples to live together in university housing and changing the Western civilization course to include more women and minority writers.

Why else, he asked, would the university president and his wife write letters to the student newspaper attacking him? And why did the dean of students send his letter attacking Rabois to the Stanford Daily before sending it to Rabois?

Replied Dean of Students Michael Jackson, "He is flattering himself if he thinks people spend their time trying to organize to get back at Keith Rabois."

"Keith Rabois thinks he's taking a stand, and so am I. I and others in the community have a right and duty to challenge the things we think are offensive."

Rabois, former president of the campus student Republicans, said gays shouldn't be allowed to teach children. When pressed, he said maybe it's OK if they are not obviously gay.

The son of liberal Democrats, Rabois said he isn't gay, he hates. "I hate Democrats," he said in a letter to the Stanford Daily. "They're the ones that have hurt the country."

Environmental Groups Meet

BY JENNIFER WILSON
Staff Writer

The formation of an environmental coalition for southeastern North Carolina will be discussed at a meeting tonight.

Leaders from 15 different environmental awareness groups in New Hanover, Pender and Brunswick counties have been invited to attend the meeting. These groups include Pender Watch, Friends of the Black River from Pender County, the Sierra Club and Earth Day Alliance from New Hanover County, said Pat Howe, temporary chair of the founding group.

Howe, a founder and active member of Pender Watch and a member of the North Carolina Crescent, explained that the idea behind the coalition is for the established environmental organizations to supplement each other with information.

"These groups have all been active in their own particular areas, but they've not been in contact with other areas," she said.

The formation of this network to address the environmental and growth concerns in the Cape Fear area "There's a need for them to reach out to each other."

Howe said that there needs to be a larger number of people supporting the protection of the quality of life in southeastern North Carolina. Reaching out to these established environmental groups is an effort to establish, "strength in numbers," she said.

will be discussed at the meeting. Also, the organizations will focus on a program which will be held in March for environmental issues and proposals to upgrade a land use in New Hanover county.

The group will discuss upcoming elections as well. "We'll be planning a lot during the public meetings," Howe said. "We're trying to make all people environmentally aware— particularly in the political arena. Some officials are totally unaware of environmental issues."

The meeting to discuss the coalition formation will be held tonight at 7:30 in Ballroom four at the University Center. It is open to the public. Call (919) 270-4172 for more information.

An Effective SGA Starts With You

The time to elect new members into the Student Government Association (SGA) is coming soon, and petitions are being accepted for new candidates.

Two members of SGA have already announced that they will run in the race for student body president, and others may appear before the deadline next week. The two candidates, Student Services Coordinator Joe Mitchell and Sophomore Class Senator Lee Person have considerable histories in SGA; the race looks to be extremely competitive. A close and competitive race means that every student vote will mean a lot.

And believe it or not, the election means a lot. For some students, SGA is a foreign institute on this campus. Its actions might seem to mean little in the day to day life of the UNCW student, but in fact the opposite is true. SGA has a hand in many of the major issues which affect students on this campus. One notable example is the fact that the student body president represents students at the UNCW board of trustees meetings. That board makes decisions about the future of this university that will affect it for years to come. But it also makes decisions which affect us now.

You think parking is a problem? The UNCW trustees has plans in the works to eliminate some of the most convenient parking lots around. The lot to the north of the University Union might be torn up to make way for a prefabricated "landmark" for the campus. As aesthetically pleasing as the landmark may be (and the beauty of the construction has been under considerable debate), it certainly doesn't seem practical. The student body president could relay your views on the subject to the board of trustees.

In addition to its connections with the university administration, SGA allocates around a quarter of a million dollars worth of student fees every year to various causes. A large amount of that money goes to student organizations, but one of the largest consumers of that money is SGA itself.

Every UNCW student can have a say in what SGA does. Simply learn about the candidates and make informed decisions when you vote. Being informed about the student body president race isn't difficult; both of the announced candidates have strong opinions and notable histories in SGA.

So, students, be informed about this election and choose the people you want in SGA. You'll make a difference this year and in the years to come.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dear Editor,

If one calculates that a three-credit course costs about $162.00 for a semester (not counting the $60 parking fee), then figures that the class should meet 32 times, it is apparent that this movie cost each student about $5.00.

Doesn't it seem logical that the staff member knew that he was to show this movie well in advance of 8:00 a.m.? Doesn't it also seem logical to check out the equipment the day before? If done in advance, then the faculty equipment could have been replaced and the show would have went on as scheduled. This I believe is what people in business would have done.

I'll venture to say that the theaters downtown don't wait until "show time" to find out that their paying guests are not going to get their money's worth.

Fellow students, you wouldn't put up with it downtown, why let UNCW do this to you? Say something, do something, its your five dollars.

Basketball Has Action In The Crowd

There has been a lot of rhetoric (rhetoric, I have been informed, is the politically correct word for "folks running their mouth") lately about whether or not a bigger and better aquarium should be built in Wilmington.

Proponents of the new aquarium maintain that it will attract thousands of money-spending tourists each year, as it will be one of the nicest on the east coast. I imagine the aquarium would also be an asset to the UNCW Marine Science Program, soon to be named "premier site" in the UNC System. And besides, if the aquarium is built, it will offer jobs for all of our graduates that don't get jobs at Sea World and/or Wal-Mart.

Opponents of the aquarium say that it isn't necessary because we already have an aquarium. My first guess is that they are referring to that tank over in Marketplace Mall! Or perhaps they are referring to the twenty gallon salt set-up, down at Fort Fisher.

Now I'm not trying to get into aquarium bashing, but the only things nice down there are the sharks, and you can't even touch them! The new aquarium will attract visitors from all around the county while the Fort Fisher aquarium only attracts people who get lost going to Carolina Beach. It only makes sense to me that we should go ahead with the plan.

No one seems to understand that the crowd is supposed to keep the players in the game, not the other way around.

Let's build the nicest fish bowl in the world.

Speaking of Fish, I am reminded of the topic which I want to address this week, BASKETBALL. Yes sports fans, we are just past the midway mark in the college basketball season and I could not let the occasion go by unnoticed. I am an avid basketball fan — How about those "Hells!" — and always try to make it to all of our home games. (This is despite the fact that campus police officers always try to make me park up in Burgaw.)

And then, when I get inside Trask Coliseum for the game, I am always amazed. If the coach at Florida State thinks Carolina has a Wine and Cheese crowd, then he should come see ours. We have a SOMINEX CROWD.

No one seems to understand that the crowd is supposed to keep the players in the game, not the other way around. We must give the home team the "Umph!" (I think that is Greek for "the ability, courage, and the emotional support...") needed to win the ball game.

I also have some other theories, involving The Seahawk, noise in Randall Library, Magic Johnson, bull horns, and campus cops. And now, for your reading enjoyment, I present my FIVE WAYS TO MAKE UNCW BASKETBALL GAMES MORE ENJOYABLE.

1.) Absolutely no campus rent-a-cops allowed within a two mile radius of Trask coliseum. One easy way to accomplish this would be to get Dunkin Donuts to advertise "All you can stuff in your gut" night during the next home game.

2.) In case #1 fails to work have everyone in attendance bring a foghorn or similar noisemaker. I don't think the entire campus police force (key word "force"), combined with those bafoons in the yellow "usher" jackets — I'll save my theory about them until a later issue — could take away all of our horns.

3.) Have Magic Johnson come and play for the Seahawks. He's playing for everyone else, so why shouldn't we exploit him too. And maybe during halftime he could sing to me, "I'm down with H-I-V, yea you know me." I don't mean any offense to the legend himself, but I think he should spend more time educating people about prophylactics instead of pro-ball.

4.) MAKE SOME NOISE! I've heard more noise coming from the graduate study room in Randall library than is made at some of our games. On the same note, those people sitting on the two end bleachers need to a) bounce around and make noise while the opposing team shoots foul shots, or b) go and throw themselves into the Cape Fear River on a high pollution day.

5.) Bring a copy of The Seahawk to the games. (This could be the closest some of you will ever come to recycling.) When the opposing team is announced, hold up the papers. When they make a good play, do the same. When a referee makes a bad call, everyone should roll their papers up and storm the court, beating the referee like a bad dog.

So you see, it doesn't all rest on Coach Eastman, the players, or even that dude on the sidelines that continually answers the phone. The success of the Seahawk basketball program lies in the hands of the home crowd. If we could just follow these five simple precepts, it shouldn't be too hard to get our team back on track. See you at the next game.

Until next time... keep your mind out of the gutter, and your head out of the toilet.

Phil Smith is a regular columnist with The Seahawk.

Ask Mr. Language Person About Grammar

A significant reason why the United States is having trouble competing in the modern industrialized world is that most Americans, through no fault of their own, are, in the words of U.S. Department of Education Secretary Lamar Alexander, "as dumb as fungus."

That is why this newspaper, at great expense and physical risk, is once again presenting "Ask Mr. Language Person," the educational feature that answers common questions about grammar, spelling and punctuation.

Today's first common question was mailed in by an actual reader, James F. Wood of Denver, Colo., who asks:

"In the song, 'Someone's in the Kitchen with Dinah,' when it says 'Someone's in the kitchen with Dinah, I know, oh, oh, oh' does it mean that the singer knows that someone is in the kitchen with Dinah, or that the singer knows WHO is in the kitchen with Dinah?"

A. Leading grammar experts have wrestled naked with this question for years. Some clues to the answer may be found in the song's reference to "strummin' on the old banjo," and the lines: "Dinah won't you blow Dinah won't you blow your horn?"

These lines strongly suggest, as was noted in a groundbreaking 1987 study by Dr. A. Howard Lornette of Yale University, "that Dinah it is a horn." But why would people be playing a horn AND an old banjo IN THE KITCHEN? And what about the song that goes, "There was a farmer had a dog, and Bingo was his name, oh?" Whose name was Bingo? The dog? Or the farmer? And when Burl Ives goes "Sing Polly Wolly Doodle all the day," does he mean we should sing all day about somebody named "Polly Wolly Doodle," or is he singing about somebody named "Polly Wolly" who goes doodle all the day? It is unlikely that these questions can be answered without massive federal funding.

Q. It had to be the dog. Who would name a farmer "Bingo"?
A. Who would name a Education Secretary "Lamar"?
Q. In the song about the bunny rabbit that attacks mice, what is the rabbit's correct name?

A. Mr. Language Person thought it was "Little Rabbit Foo Foo." However, Mrs. Language Person contends — and the prestigious "Wee Sing Song Booklet" backs her up on this — that it is "Little Bunny Foo Foo." But consider the following: Mr. Language Person is certain that, in the correct version, the rabbit is PICKING UP THE FIELD MICE AND BOPPING THEM ON THE HEAD. Whereas the "Wee Sing Song Booklet" contends that it is SCOPING UP THE MEECY MICE AND BOPPIN' 'EM ON THE HEAD.

Q. MEECY Mice? How does William Safire feel about that?

A. He feels very strongly that "Foo-foo" should be hyphenated. Q. Speaking of lyrics, what is the most romantic song ever written?

A. That would be "Boom Boom," by John Lee Hooker, which is copyrighted by Conrad Music, a division of Arc Music Corp., and which includes the following verse, reprinted by permission:

"I like the way you walk, I like the way you talk, When you walk that walk, And you talk that talk, You knock me out, Right off my feet."

Q. You had to get permission to reprint a verse that rhymes "out" with "feet"?

A. Yes.

Q. What does it mean to "put the onus" on somebody?

A. This is an ancient legal expression referring to the "onus," which was a large rock that was used in ancient court proceedings.

DEFENDANT: I plead not guilty.

JUDGE: All right, then, put the onus on him.

DEFENDANT: I MEAN GUILTY! GUILTY!

Q. What is the difference between a "consensus" and a "general consensus of opinion"?

A. "Consensus" is used when selecting toppings, as in: "The consensus between Phil, Norm and myself is, garlic and pepperoni." Whereas "general consensus of opinion" is used when discussing somebody who is not in the room at the time, as in: "The general consensus of opinion is that those puff sleeves make Darlene look like a Chicago Bear."

Q. Speaking of football, have you heard any good quotations from professional football analyst and former Kansas City Chiefs coach Hank Stram recently?

A. Yes. Hank emitted an excellent one Dec. 16 on a Miami sports-talk radio show, when he was asked what the New Orleans Saints needed to do to get ready for their game against the Oakland Raiders.

Q. What did he say?

A. He said, quote: "I think they have to desperately come into this game with an urgent feeling."

Q. Whatever happened to Hank Stram's neck, anyway?

A. Apparently it was stolen. Got a question for Mr. Language Person? Write it down and hide it in a safe place.

Stillpoint with Bob Haywood Look For Grace In Everyday Experience

My life is full of beauty and wonder and grace. Is yours?

I dictated this column as I drove down Interstate 95 towards Wilmington from an intense 24-hour business meeting in Richmond, Virginia. As I drove along, I found myself with this wonderfully weird sense of riding on top of this great round ball in space. I was filled with wonder at the force that keeps me fastened to the earth and yet allows me to look into the blue sky and realize that I am gifted with a view of forever. Not only can this happen, all of us earthly two-leggeds are able to know what's going on and be surprised by wonder.

I don't see me being in any way special. I believe there is a capacity for beauty, wonder and grace in each one of us. The trick is to cultivate these things. The trick is to find within us the capacity to turn away from pressures that keep our eyes focused so completely on schedules and projects and pressure.

When my eyes focus only straight ahead on the road before me and on the path that leads me back to Wilmington, my range of awareness is very limited and I tire out very quickly.

I find it very possible to keep part of my mind attentive to the task of driving by letting another major portion of my mind play. I play with images of my family and the wonder of my love for them. I play with the idea of the coming spring break cruise and get excited about returning to another week of wonder.

I come away from the meeting filled with a sense of grace at my good fortune at being employed in something that I enjoy. If I'm different from any of you, it is only in the fact that I have learned and chosen to seek wonder. The Bible has a verse that says, "You who have eyes to see, let him see."

I think this is basically inviting us to see deeper than a particular incident or a particular moment, to place it in some context of meaning and value. We are surrounded by little experiences of grace if we only have eyes to see, whether it be the flight of an egret or the diving of a pelican or the flight of a cardinal on the way to class or the pleasure of studying by a window on a grey and rainy day or feeling that small sense of satisfaction when you're concluded a test or the pleasure of a hot shower after a cold run around the field.

At the risk of being extreme, one moment of small beauty might be found in enjoying the reds and oranges and variegated greens in your salad in the cafeteria.

We are surrounded, absolutely surrounded, by experiences and times and moments where our hearts and minds can be touched by wonder. I often call these little experiences "gracelets," little drops of grace, easy to miss but rich in their ability to saturate our lives in a sense of well-being.

In a discussion of beauty in my freshman seminar, one student talked about his experience of hitting a home run in the bottom of the ninth as something beautiful to him. I believe it! Where do you find beauty in your day, in these hours, in this moment? I hope that you will work at learning to see with eyes willing to behold the grace that surrounds you.

Special Barry Report This New Hampshire Thing Is A Hoot

BY DAVE BARRY
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

MANCHESTER, N.H. — And so, once again, we in the professional news media have descended upon this bitter-cold, wind-swept, snow-covered state in an effort to answer the question that, every four years, burns in the minds of every American who cares about the democratic process, namely: Can we charge thermal underwear to our expense accounts?

Also we're interested in the presidential primary, which is coming up next week and should be very exciting because every single candidate involved, for both parties, is now seen by the press as a pathetic loser.

Our biggest loser right now is Bill Clinton, who was declared the front-runner several weeks ago despite the fact that nobody has the vaguest idea where he stands on any issues and his nose always seems to be stopped up. But we in the press always need a front-runner, because we need to have somebody who we can declare is faltering, and so we gave the job to Bill.

Bill's poll ratings are now dropping like a pig thrown out of a helicopter.

If you voters feel it's high-handed of us to make this kind of decision before any actual voter has actually voted, all I can say, by way of thoughtful explanation, is: Shut up. This is an ELECTION CAMPAIGN we're talking about. The public has NOTHING TO DO with it. If you voters want to have a say in it, you should get press credentials like everybody else.

So anyway, Bill was the front-runner for 15 or 20 minutes, after which we declared him to be in Falter Mode because of all these disgusting unsubstantiated rumors, which I will not dignify by repeating here, concerning Bill and Gennifer Flowers and Tammy Wynette and Donna Rice and the Brazilian national gymnastics team and draft evasion and an unsolved string of 17 convenience-store robberies.

I say it's time that the press stopped prying into these poor candidates' personal lives. I say it's none of our business what Bill Clinton does in his spare time with a ski mask and an assault rifle, and you will see none of that kind of trash in THIS column unless one of his opponents offers me money.

Anyway, Bill's poll ratings are now dropping like a pig thrown out of a helicopter, and so we in the press have selected a new front-runner. We apparently were drinking heavily when we did this, because the choice we came up with is — get ready — Paul E. Tsongas. Really. This is a man so low-key that he may be capable of photosynthesis, a man who makes Michael Dukakis seem like James Brown.

Nevertheless he is our front-runner, and I'm sure he holds many important views on the issues. But right now the important thing for you, the voters, to bear in mind when considering him as a potential president is that the letters in "Paul E. Tsongas" can be rearranged to spell "Gaseous Plant."

But that is not the worst of it. According to a confidential document sent to me by concerned Americans Andy J. Williams and Chris Lasell, who used the Dartmouth College computer to figure this out — and people have the nerve to say that young people don't care about the issues — the name "Paul E. Tsongas" can also be rearranged to spell "A Tulsa Sponge," "Agent Soul Sap" and "Satan Plus Ego."

I'll have further information on this alarming development in the Tsongas campaign as I become more desperate. I will also be discussing the other major candidates in thoughtful detail as I find out, using advanced journalism techniques, who they are. But first I'm getting squared away on the underwear front.

Little Seahawk Directors Chosen

BY JENNY NEAL
Staff Writer

The framework for the Little Seahawk, a program that assigns a freshman an upperclassman to help with their transition to college life, has been established.

Ten directors have been appointed to execute and plan the Little Seahawk program. These directors will be responsible for publicity, program activities, planning, coordinating and implementing the program.

The aim of the Little Seahawk program is to improve the number of students who return after their freshman year. It is being sponsored by the Student Government Association. Representing them in the program are Student Services Coordinator Joe Mitchell and Senator Krista Habecker and Freshman Class President Roger Hyman.

"Directors were chosen from their respective organizations upon the individual's interest in the Little Seahawk program," Habecker said. "Directors are responsible for establishing and implementing the program."

The committee in charge of the program has suggested that some of the activities with the Big Buddies, upperclassmen who participate in the program, include a field day banquet, movie night and participation on the ropes course. The general role of the big buddy is to answer questions and concerns of the incoming freshmen and do an activity every two to three weeks to make them feel welcome and at home.

The directors were chosen from on-campus organizations. They are: Harold Dixon, NAACP; Rob Tripp, Pi Kappa Phi and the Interfraternity Council; Kim Martin, Panhellenic Council; Michelle Mathews, Alpha Gamma Delta; Natalie Bassman, Residence Hall Association; Candi Shipp, Orientation staff; and Habecker, Hyman and Mitchell.

Be My Valentine, Please

A-a-h-h. St. Valentine's Day, yet another holiday to make the single, unattached people of the world feel emotionally inadequate. (Like me.) A day to celebrate the fact that everyone in the entire universe has someone, except you. (Like me.) What's worse is there is no Dick Clark Rockin' Valentine's Eve from Time's Square to get people (like me) through the night.

St. Valentine's Day is actually a meshing of two historic events: the canonization of a Roman priest, who, while imprisoned, sent affectionate letters to loved ones, and the celebration of Lupercalia, which was a Roman festival in honor of the god of flocks and fertility. After a few animal sacrifices, young men would race through the village (naked, as rumor has it) and would strike various women with whips made of goatskin. How romantic.

Well, our modern methods have slightly improved, thanks to the capitalism of the major card, candy, and flower industries. I hardly think a goatskin whipping would put many in a very good mood. (Like me.) But a whipping WITH a card, flowers and a plethora of compliments (cash rewards wouldn't hurt either) might woe some. (Like me.)

In lieu of that, just keep me away from chocolate, heavy artillery and delightfully happy couples, and I'll be fine. On second thought, I'll keep the chocolate.

I hope all of you have a wonderfully romantic Valentine's Day. Yeah... Right.

Sean Connery's Medicine Man Needs A Shot In The Arm

BY D. NEAL LEEPER
Entertainment Writer

It's Wednesday night, and I am trying to decide on a movie to review for the paper. I want to find something that would appeal to all audiences, be entertaining and above all else, one in which my readers would like. After seeing the Medicine Man previews on television and in the theaters, my choice became apparent. How could a movie be bad when the main character has starred in such incredible films as the original James Bond series, The Hunt For Red October, Highlander, and The Russia House? Friday night's viewing proved that Medicine Man is the movie Sean Connery should have passed up.

The story takes place deep within the rain forests of Brazil in a tiny village of pignoles. Dr. Rae Crane, played by lovely Lorraine Bracco, begins her trek in the forest in search of Dr. Robert Campbell, played by Connery, to deliver some additional equipment critical to his medical experiments.

After traveling for three days she arrives at the camp only to find Campbell drunk. During his intoxicated stage, he suggests field research would not be appropriate for her, and will arrange for her travel home. She disagrees. After an interesting night, (including your typical bug, snake and lizard scares) she awakens to find out the purpose of Campbell's research. It seems that the cure for cancer has been discovered in the rain forest.

Sounds easy, right? Wrong. It is not that simple. It seems the original formula, or serum, was prepared differently from the other samples. Time suddenly becomes a scarce resource as a road being built threatens the location where the crucial plants grow.

Will the doctors find the correct formula in time? Will the world be rid of cancer?

This is the basis for the movie's plot. The rest of the film consists of silly little antics that eventually draw the two doctors together. That seems fitting, doesn't it? Dr. Campbell has spent three years by himself in the woods, and here comes the beautiful counterpart to make the picture complete. The romance had to be there from the start.

Medicine Man contains good acting but the plot was boring, bland and seemed to drone on forever. The movie's hour and a half running time was truly felt by all. It seemed that everyone in the theater shifted at least twelve times. Although I am a fan of Sean Connery, I must say that he could have done a better than this film.

After heavy meditation, I have decided this film deserves a two: if you have nothing else to do, do something else. Until next time.

Country's Garth Brooks Can't Be Fenced In

BY RENN WILSON
Entertainment Writer

In two short years Oklahoma born Garth Brooks has etched himself into the music history books in indelible ink with a string of firsts, headline media and outstanding achievements in the music industry.

1991 started with Brooks scooping up an American Music Award (AMA) for country song of the year, "If Tomorrow Comes." He broke the Academy of Country Music's (ACM) all time record by sweeping the 1991 awards show, grabbing six awards: Best Entertainer, Male Vocalist, Album (No Fences), Video ("The Dance"), Song ("The Dance") and Single ("Friends in Low Places") of the year. Soon after that, his controversial video "The Thunder Rolls" was banned by Country Music Television, only to be quickly added to pop cable channel VH-1.

By May of 1991, Brooks had sold over 6 million copies of his first two albums Garth Brooks and No Fences, and scored a consistent string of #1 hits, many staying at the top of the charts for weeks. Garth received 3 AMA awards this past January. He received more nominations than anyone at the 1990 Country Music awards and walked away with both the Horizon Award and Video of the Year ("The Dance"). He also received a Grammy nomination for his performance of "Friends in Low Places." In May 1991, he topped the pop charts with his album No Fences, reaching number one. Then he did it again in October with his latest album Ropin' the Wind. (The last country act to do this was Kenny Rogers in 1980.) Brooks also joined the Grand Ole Opry as its 65th member and donated his signature hat and striped shirt to the Country Music Hall of Fame.

I've had a chance to meet Brooks on two occasions, once at the NC State Fair and this past year in Winston-Salem. To anyone who knows Brooks, his success is not surprising. He isn't just another crooning cowboy from the crop of budding superstars wearing boots and hats. He brings another dimension to his music; the complexity of his personality and a well-established charisma. He's quiet, thoughtful, introspective, a soulful and emotional vocalist, but also capable of turning into a variable guitar-breaking, romping, stomping wild man on stage, as seen on his TV special that aired last month.

As I talked with Brooks, he was reflecting on his life, his wife Sandy, who is currently weathering a difficult pregnancy, and his album, No Fences.

Valentine's Day Videos To Rent

Fatal Attraction—A scary reminder that faithfulness should be more than just a virtue. Glenn Close plays the deranged thwarted lover who teaches unfaithful husband, Michael Douglas, a few lessons. Yeah, like he didn't deserve it.

When Harry Met Sally—A funny friendship (finally) turns into an even funnier romance. Billy Crystal and Meg Ryan exchange some of the wittiest and most honest dialogue around.

Student Is Kidnapped And Held Culturally Captive At Symphony

BY SHANNON DAVIS
Entertainment Writer

After enjoying a quiet, relaxing, lazy Saturday afternoon, I decided to repeat the performance for Saturday night. I was looking forward to doing nothing. Actually, this was good, because there was nothing to do.

I had just settled down to an HBO flick, when I heard a soft knocking on my door. I opened it only to see before me three weary travelers (three of my friends) with lost, blank expressions on their faces. (M.W.S.— Monk Withdrawal Syndrome, no doubt.) They wouldn't come in, they just stood there with this hypnotizing look in their eyes. This was almost enough to put my relaxed self into a trance.

Finally I said, "Either speak so I know you're not possessed by zombified aliens or I'm shutting the door." The leader of this zoned-out trio stepped forward and said, "We are going to be 'culturalized' and you're coming with us."

Trying to treat them like the last 15 magazine salesmen that had come to my door in a month, I said, "No thanks, I'm not interested." But before I could slam the door in their faces the other two grabbed me and forced me into their car. I said, "You guys cannot kidnap me." They said, (in unison) "We can. And we did."

"Alright, this is getting ridiculous," I said. "What do you mean we're getting 'culturalized'? Where are we going?"

Of course they gave me no reply. As we pulled into the Kenan Auditorium parking lot and I saw a lot of older people who were dressed up walking into the building, I cleverly put two and two together.

"You guys are taking me to a concert, aren't you? Who are we going to see?"

The leader of the trio looked me straight in the eyes and said, "Shannon, we are here to see the Wilmington Symphony Orchestra."

The "alright I can handle this" smirk disintegrated off my face. "We're going to see an orchestra on a Saturday night?"

"Yes, we are." They forced me out of the car and towards the auditorium.

"Ok, ok. I'll try anything once. This could be a new learning experience. We'll, uh, get 'culturalized'."

I tried to put on a convincing smile as I checked to see how tight they were holding my arms. There was no chance for a clean escape. I was trapped.

We walked in, entered for free with our trusty student ID's and took our seats on the back row. The auditorium was full. I'd never seen so many dead animals, I mean, fur coats in one room.

The program was entitled "Pictures at an Exhibition" and the conductor was one of UNCW's very own music professors, Steve Ernate.

The orchestra performed Beethoven, and was accompanied on piano by Mark Seelig, a junior at Hoggard High School. This young lad made quite an impression on everyone.

"Pictures at an Exhibition" included ten songs, each presented to describe a different picture painted by the late gifted architect Victor Hartman.

The concert provided me with a soothing and relaxing feeling (probably more than the HBO flick could have done) and I really did enjoy myself.

This was one of the few cultural experiences I've had at UNCW, and that's a shame. Movies, clubs and parties will always be around, but specific plays, concerts and art exhibits won't. We really should take advantage of them and support our school in its effort to bring them to us.

It's not something you'll regret experiencing, I promise. So go 'culturalize' yourself.

"QUOTE OF THE WEEK"

"A man has such a strong need to succeed and provide—it's one of the most fundamental aspects of the animal. I don't care how smart he is or how aware he is of woman's place, men are threatened by a woman who is independent. And the more she grows, the worse it gets."

People In The News...

BY JOHN BARRY

LUKE'S SOLO, AND STILL NASTY

He's ba-a-ck. Just when you thought it was safe to let your impressionable youngster out of his hermetically sealed bubble, pom rap pioneer Luther Campbell has returned with a new release—his first as a solo act. What's it called? Well, depends on your age. If you're a bleary-eyed over-21-year-old, the name of the album is "I Got S— On My Mind." But, if you're a bright-eyed whippersnapper, then you'll want the "clean" version with the creative spelling: "I Got Sumphin' On My Mind." Either way, according to Luke Records spokeswoman Debbie Bennett, you'll get vintage Luke. She says the 2 Live Crew leader has experimented with some changes in musical style, but as far as substance goes, he remains as nasty as he wanna be. Speaking of which, Luke's new book, "As Nasty As They Wanna Be: The Uncensored Story of the 2 Live Crew" (co-written by John R. Miller) is due in bookstores by Friday.

HIRSCHFELD'S HORIZONS

Abe Hirschfeld, whose "Honest Abe" mayoral campaign in Miami Beach last fall failed to awaken the dozing masses from civic lethargy, has returned to Manhattan, where, you know, people are less cynical and more open to new ideas. The 73-year-old multimillionaire reveals in Newday ideas for improving New York:

—A revival of the '60s musical "Hair" on Broadway, which he is negotiating.

—A proposal to move the United Nations across town to a site five times larger along the Hudson River. (He owns a 20 percent interest in the site.)

—A plan to eliminate the drug problem in New York, the nation and the world, with 100 percent guaranteed success.

Support is building slowly. One gossip columnist recently carped that a flower-covered tuxedo worn by Abe at a black-tie affair made him look like a float. "I was the only one not dressed like the waiters," Al replied.

DIE-HARD LIBERAL

"We've long had hopes of converting Leonard Bernstein to the Republican Party. But it's about time to give up." —David Beckwith, spokesman for Dan Quayle, when he heard that Quayle's office recently sent a fund-raising letter to the composer, who died more than a year ago.

THE SUSPECT WORE ANTLERS

What fearsome creature of the wild is the top killer of human beings? You're thinking sharks, right? Nope, sharks aren't even in the top 5. Gators? Uh-uh. They don't even make the top 10. The top mankilling critter, according to Men's Health magazine, is Bambi. That's right, deer were personally responsible for 131 of the 200 human deaths in the U.S. last year involving encounters with wild animals. Generally, their modus operandi is to step in front of your car on a dark patch of interstate. The results are often fatal to both deer and human.

Here's a list of the top killers:

1. Deer, 131 deaths.
2. Bees, 43.
3. Dogs, 14.
4. Rattlesnakes, 10.
5. Spiders, 4.
6. Sharks, 1.

Tyson

when the nation is struggling with issues of what constitutes appropriate sexual behavior — and when reports of rape and other sex crimes are skyrocketing.

Yet while each case received nonstop coverage, the nature of that coverage differed substantially and is likely to affect the way the public views the verdicts.

With Smith, Court TV and CNN carried the trial live to more than 10 million Americans, more than any legal proceeding in U.S. history. That meant people interested in the case could weigh the evidence and decide for themselves who was telling the truth.

With Tyson, however, cameras were barred from the Indianapolis courtroom. The electronic news blackout made it tougher for people to monitor what was happening in the courtroom and analysts say, may make the public more skeptical about the verdict announced last night.

"It would be nice if we all could have seen it, then we wouldn't be sitting here wondering what the differences were between the two cases," Brill said. "We've heard about it, we've read everybody's interpretation of the testimony, but people who are skeptical about whether a kid from the streets of Brooklyn could get a fair trial in Indiana probably would have felt a lot better if they could have seen the trial."

Will Tyson's verdict encourage other women to file rape charges?

It could, feminists have said, the same way Smith's acquittal appeared to have a dampening effect on women coming forward with charges of sexual abuse.

But Brill, who is editor-in-chief of The American Lawyer, said the two verdicts taken together "show that the legal system is not weighed one way or the other. It operates with jurors weighing evidence and weighing facts; they don't get involved in big geopolitical trends.

"If Tyson and Smith had both been acquitted, pundits would be saying that no woman is taken seriously when she charges rape, while if both had been convicted, every pundit would be saying that no high-profile defendant can get a fair trial.

"In truth, it gets down to a jury and testimony and real facts and real evidence and people making very specific judgments about very specific things, which is the way it should be."

Bopp predicted that Tyson — who could face 60 years in prison — is likely to be sentenced to at least 10 years. But the sentence could be harsher, the criminologist added, if Tyson's record of earlier crimes is considered.

"Some of that earlier record," Bopp said, "was teen-age stuff. It depends whether they consider him a first-timer or second- or third-timer."

Races Set For SGA Elections This March

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

Politics will be alive and well on campus as the elections for student government draw closer. The elections to be held March 18-19, are to elect members of the executive board of the Student Government Association and other open offices. There are candidates for every office but junior class president.

Filing for the elections was slow. Most candidates waited until the last minute, said Shasta McAllister, election board chairman. She said that on Monday there were 14 candidates. McAllister asked the SGA senate on Monday to extend the Wednesday filing deadline to Friday. "At the time I asked, there were only 14 candidates. The senate knew about the deadline but the students didn't know until Thursday. They had Friday, Monday, Tuesday and today to file."

The senate voted, after debate and a tie vote, not to extend the deadline. McAllister did not think the vote would be a tough one. "At least they debated and came to a decision," she said.

McAllister said that the majority of the turnout to file for office had been on Wednesday and that she expected more by the final deadline.

If the vacant positions have no candidates by the filing deadline, McAllister said that there are two ways that they can be filled. "If no one runs for the position, there can be a write-in campaign or someone can petition for it. If there is someone that is planning a write-in campaign for one of the positions, they need to meet with me at least four days prior to the elections."

If there are write-ins that have not met with McAllister, the votes for the candidate are invalid.

To petition for a seat, the candidate must collect 50 names that must be verified.

There are to be polling places. They will be at the University Center and Wagoner Hall. The elections are to be held on March 18-19. Times at the University Center are 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. on March 18 and 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. on March 19. At Wagoner Hall, polling will be held on March 18 during lunch and dinner and on March 19 during lunch.

Some of the offices to be filled during the election are SGA president, vice president, attorney general and student services coordinator.

Candidates registered to run for president are: Lee Person, presently sophomore class senator; Joe Mitchell, presently student services coordinator; and

Speaker From 'Public Enemy' To Visit UNCW

BY JENNIFER WILSON
Staff Writer

Harry Allen, self proclaimed activist and media assassin for the rap group Public Enemy, will visit UNCW on Wednesday, February 26.

Allen will give a lecture about Public Enemy and about the current social atmosphere in America, said Frank Tascone, student activities coordinator. His visit is sponsored by the Association of Campus Entertainment.

"Allen speaks about racism in America, saying that the only form of racism is white supremacy and that only a white person can be a racist," said Chris Arcy, who heard Allen speak at Vanderbilt University.

"He's not so much anti-white as he is pro-black," Arcy said.

"No one is opposed to his coming to campus yet," said Tascone. "It will be interesting to see."

Other members of Public Enemy: Chuck D, Flavor Flav and Terminator X, along with Allen have spoken at prisons and at urban centers for children.

Some of the music in the repertoire of Public Enemy includes a song called "Bring The Noise", a collaboration with the heavy metal band Anthrax and their current "By The Time I Get To Arizona", whose video depicts political leaders being shot. The video is in retaliation of the fact that Arizona and New Hampshire are the only two states that do not recognize Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday as a national holiday.

Allen's lecture will begin at 7:30 p.m. in Kenan Auditorium. Admission will be free for UNCW students and three dollars for the general public.

Because of the spring break holidays, THE SEAHAWK will not be published on Feb. 27 or March 5. The next edition will appear on March 12. Please remember that the deadline for At A Glance submissions, advertising, and letters to the editor is the Monday before Thursday's edition.

Officials Debate Censorship

BY BARBARA A.
SERRANO
Seattle Times

OLYMPIA, Wash. — See no evil. Speak no evil. Hear no evil. Live Crew.

In a move prompted by the "pretty bad language" of a 4-year-old boy, state lawmakers are pushing a measure that would put "crucial-sounding" recordings under lock and key in music stores.

The House voted 96-2 Monday to approve a bill by Rep. Richard King, D-Everett, prohibiting the sale of sexually suggestive records, tapes and compact discs to minors. If approved by the state Senate and signed into law by Gov. Booth Gardner, the new restriction would be tacked onto a state law that already prohibits businesses from selling erotic photographs, pictures, films and magazines to anyone under 18.

King called his bill, HB 2554, "a major step in the right direction of allowing parents some say over what is sold to their children."

But some retailers labeled it censorship. They suggested lawmakers have more important things to worry about than dirty-talking artists such as Prince, 2 Live Crew and NWA.

"Where are you going to draw the line, and how much work are we going to put into deciding what's appropriate for kids?" said Mike Hathaway, general manager of Budget Tapes and Discs in Everett, 30 miles north of Seattle. "Does government police kids, or do parents?"

The idea of a sales prohibition arose two years ago when Karen Leslie's 4-year-old son, Allyn, asked the meaning of certain words in "As Nasty As They Wanna Be," an album by rap group 2 Live Crew.

Leslie figures her son picked up the profanity when her 16-year-old nephew was living with the family and frequently played the tape. He had bought it from the Everett music store.

So Leslie mounted a one-woman campaign to get the audible pornography away from minors, who she says "are getting warped" by listening to it.

King's bill makes retailers criminally liable for displaying or selling any music that "appeals to the prurient interest of minors in sex; which is patently offensive because it affronts contemporary community standards relating to ... sexual matters or sadomasochistic abuse; and is utterly without redeeming social value."

Local judges could be asked to decide whether a recording is legally erotic and whether the state ought to require that it be labeled for adults only.

Retailers who disobeyed the display and sale restrictions could be subject to a fine of up to $500 and six months in jail for the first offense. A three-time offender would get slapped with a $5,000 fine and up to a year in jail.

Hathaway thinks such legislation would cause retailers to lock away any recordings that are in any way explicit. Budget Tapes, with four locations in Snohomish and Kitsap counties, does require 2 Live Crew aficionados to show I.D. before making a purchase.

The proposed state sales restrictions come as no big surprise to local music-store owners. Similar legal moves against explicit lyrics have been made by lawmakers, judges and prosecutors across the country. And 2 Live Crew has been one of the most popular targets.

Two years ago, a Fort Lauderdale judge charged the Miami rappers with illegally performing their music just days after it had been declared obscene. Retailers in Illinois, Texas and Florida were hit with charges for selling the music to adults and minors.

The anti-pornography movement in music heated up in 1985 under the leadership of Tipper Gore, wife of Sen. Al Gore, D-Tenn., and has been viewed largely as a backlash against the increasing use of explicit and violent lyrics in rock, heavy metal and rap music. Since then, the record industry has voluntarily instituted a uniform labeling system warning parents of potentially offensive material.

King, a retired college teacher, said he's strongly opposed to any censorship laws. But he felt compelled to sponsor this one for children after he listened to the 2 Live Crew tape "As Nasty As They Wanna Be."

Most of the album's lyrics graphically describe sex acts, perversion and violence toward women.

"It's pretty disgusting," said King.

Two House Democrats — Reps. Mike Riley of Longview and Dennis Braddock of Bellingham — weren't swayed by the arguments.

Braddock said he thinks the forbidden-fruit syndrome will come into play: Minors will be even more eager to get their hands on outlawed music.

Riley, a sheriff's deputy from Cowlitz County, sees irony in the House's overwhelming support for anti-pornography legislation. Huge black-and-white murals titled "The Labors of Hercules" that adorn the House chamber walls are considered obscene by some lawmakers and for years were covered by drapes.

Ames Crowned Homecoming Queen

Junior elementary education major Stephanie Ames was crowned as 1992 homecoming queen Saturday during the UNCW vs. George Mason basketball game. Ames is from Goldsboro.

In a change from previous years, no homecoming king was crowned.

Ames was one of 12 women selected to be on the homecoming court. The other members were Christine Bricker, a political science major; Lisa Capell, a psychology major; Tara Early, a speech communication major; Christy Gummell, a history major; Carol Henderson, a speech communication major; Charissa-Hinson, a speech communication major; Jane Hock, a criminal justice major; Suzanne Little, an elementary education major;

Crystal Marshall, an elementary education major; Whitney Walker, a marine biology major; and Jill Wanchook, an English/education major.

Housing Fair To Be Held Feb. 26

BY LAURA KEETER
Staff Writer

The Housing Fair, to be held February 26, offers more this year than a simple look at off-campus complexes.

Campus Police, Residence Life and Student Legal Services attorneys Ellen Kiernan and Bruce Mason will be present while the fair rolls on from 10 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. in the ballroom of the University Center. Packets of information from local insurance companies regarding rental insurance will be also available, said Assistant Dean of Students Jacque Skinner.

"It's looking at trying to help students make an informed decision about living off-campus, and also helping them be aware of the added responsibilities that go with living in the community," she said.

Kiernan said that she and Mason will answer questions at the fair. They will "tag team" the event, alternating times. Kiernan said that their goal is to give practical advice to help students avoid problems, such as landlord/tenant problems and lease negotiations.

"A lot of the problems that students run into is they go out, look at a house and it's attractive and it's got a good location, but a lot of students forget to turn on the water and see if the hot water works or find out if the air conditioner works," she said.

The attorneys will help the students with questions they should ask before entering a lease.

Officials from Residence Life will be at the fair to answer questions about procedures and costs for those who want to move back to campus. Skinner said.

Approximately 19 apartment managers and three real estate companies have been invited.

Those who accept will pay a $50 donation that will go toward the cost of invitations to be placed in student mailboxes before the fair. The apartments to be at the fair will show up as sponsors on the invitation.

"I can tell you from past history those complexes within walking distance to the university are usually there," Skinner said.

Free food will be offered at the fair. Free cookies will be offered in the morning and starting at 11:30, food from co-sponsors ARA, Itza Pizza, Pizza Hut, Crazy's Pizza, Domino's, Dino's, Hardee's and Subway will be offered.

"If a student wants to come and have pizza for lunch and walk around the housing fair, he can. It just makes it convenient to eat and shop, so to speak," Skinner said.

Skinner said that she expects a few hundred students to attend. Students usually shop around because they are tired of living in the same place, or of trying to find a cheaper place or of trying to find one closer to campus, she said. "Students without a car can get free information without having to get a ride or learn about them by word of mouth."

"We've got those few hundred students who don't know what they're going to do, don't know where they're going to live or even if they want to live off campus if they're residence students," Skinner said.

Miranda Rutledge, manager of Campus Edge apartments on Racine Drive, said, "We wouldn't miss it for the world. It's a wonderful way to show prospective tenants what we have to offer." She said she thinks some students make the decision of where they will live next year at the fair.

Elections

Student Body President Curtis L. Wilson.

Two candidates are registered to fill Mitchell's position, Ivy Chalmers, presently special senator, and Robert Oliver, currently junior class senator.

Sean Williams, Ziggy Nix, both spring representatives Sophomore Class Senator L. fi Gurkin and Vern Grainger will run for vice president.

Lisa Royal is registered to run for attorney general.

SGA office manager Suzie Goodrum said the candidates are registered to run, but class hours qualifying them for positions have not been checked and the list of candidates could change due to disqualification.

McAllister said that she hopes that there will be a big turnout for the election, topping the 568 that voted in the fall elections.

Senate Placed In Difficult Position

A hot debate took place in the SGA senate Monday night over whether to extend the deadline to enter the SGA elections. As of that night, there were several openings for SGA positions next year. Election Board Chair Shasta McAllister asked the senate to extend the deadline to give people more time to enter the elections. She hoped the extra time would get new people to run for SGA positions.

Senior Senator Ken Lemon made the motion that the deadline be extended, but the motion met with resistance from many of the senators at the meeting, some of whom are entered in the elections.

Lemon pointed out that those who were running in the election had a clear conflict of interests. By extending the deadline, senators in the race would be inviting competition. It was certainly in their best interests to keep the deadline when it was, and for some of them, guarantee themselves unopposed races.

He is certainly right. Senators who are about to begin re-election campaigns cannot objectively vote on whether to extend the entrance deadline.

On the other hand, the Senate was placed in an impossible position. The senators were faced with the choice of voting with a conflict of interests, or doing nothing which might result in a desolate ballot on election day.

The fact is, the issue should have never been taken to the Senate. The entrance deadlines can be approved by the Senate before anyone declares his candidacy for re-election, and then they should not be altered.

The fact that no one is signing up shouldn't justify a bad Senate vote; there are always write-in campaigns to fill the vacant spots. Anyway, how responsible a senator will a person be if he can't even remember to sign up for the election before the deadline?

The deadline was not extended by the Senate, but several more candidates signed up to enter before the deadline Wednesday. Most positions will have declared candidates on the ballot.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Queen Victimized By Prejudice

Dear Editor,

It's 1992! Or is it? If you were in attendance at the Homecoming game this past Saturday, as was I, you may have had to ask yourself what year it was, 1992 or 1962? When last year's Homecoming queen was presented, you could hear a pin drop in a certain half of the student section. If that wasn't bad enough, when this year's queen was announced, you could almost hear a box of pins drop in that same part of the student section. Why was that you ask? Was it because this year's queen was black or because she wasn't Greek?

In this day and age I would hope that it wasn't because she was black or even because she wasn't Greek. I'd like to believe that everyone in that section just lost all feeling in both of their hands for a moment, but we know that's not true.

If people didn't agree that she should have won, then you should have voted for the person you wanted to win. But don't be so immature and self-centered and not applaud the young lady that won the title fair and square. I feel that a lot of people on this campus need to take a long, hard look at not only themselves, but the world around us. Being a Greek myself, I would like to apologize on behalf of some certain students for their behavior at the game. Some people have a lot of learning to do. So, my advice is to take a couple of classes - either "How not to be a Racist:101", or "Greeks aren't the Greatest:202".

Police Aren't Responsible For Quiet Crowds

Dear Editor,

I am writing concerning Phil Smith's February 13th article "Basketball Has Action In the Crowd." I do not see what the "Sominex Crowd" at the basketball games has to do with the campus police. I was once a campus "Rent a Cop" and I had to work the games.

Campus police are there to ensure the safety of both the players and the fans. They only get involved when they see it necessary.

Concerning the statement about "campus police making you park in Burgaw," those are the only spaces available for the fans to park. What is wrong with walking a couple of yards? It won't hurt you, I promise. Not to mention the fact that if the campus police officers weren't allowed near the gym who would protect your cars? I am sure you will be the first to complain if your car is broken into.

I think the campus police officers are doing a hell of a job. I believe that you should leave them out of it when it comes to basketball games, because they have nothing to do with whether or not the crowd cheers loud at games.

Sincerely yours,
Lisa Kellogg

Media Make Politics More Interesting

Well, the presidential campaign is officially underway, with two primaries over, and I'm enjoying the frivolity.

The media has jumped on one of the front runner's past like the proverbial flies (somehow that analogy came to mind) and defended itself by saying, and I quote, "Hey, it's not like everyday we can talk to a real live girl named Jennifer, dude."

We have one Democrat who has a past of us can relate to (or would like to) and the media says there is no way this guy should ever be considered for the nation's highest office because he may sleep with an enemy and jeopardize national security. Yeah, right. We all saw how James Bond hurt England.

Another candidate has done everything right, has no personality, and has said all the right things and we think he may be "capable of photosynthesis."

Where do we draw the line? Of all the states in the Union (and no, rednecks, I'm not referring to a certain Civil War), why do we start with Iowa and New Hampshire?

Besides "Radar" O'Reilly, what has Iowa given us? Corn? What? Wow!

New Hampshire? Who

Dave Barry

So, You Want To Go Out, Or What?

As a mature adult, I feel an obligation to help the younger generation, just as the mother fish guards her unhatched eggs, keeping her lonely vigil day after day, never leaving her post, not even to go to the bathroom, until her tiny babies emerge and she is able, at last, to eat them. "She may be your mom, but she's still a fish," is a wisdom nugget that I would pass along to any fish eggs reading this column.

But today I want to talk about dating. This subject was raised in a letter to me from a young person named Eric Knott, who writes:

"I have got a big problem. There's this girl in my English class who is really good looking. However, I don't think she knows I exist. I want to ask her out, but I'm afraid she will say no, and I will be the freak of the week. What should I do?"

Eric, you have sent your question to the right mature adult, because as a young person I spent a lot of time thinking about this very problem. Starting in about eighth grade, my time was divided as follows:

Academic Pursuits: 2 percent.
Zits: 16 percent
Trying to Figure Out How to Ask Girls Out: 82 percent.

The most sensible way to ask a girl out is to walk directly up to her on foot and say, "So, you want to go out? Or what?" I never did this. I knew, as Eric Knott knows, that there was always the knows? Maine has Stephen King, Vermont has a capital no one can remember or pronounce, and Massachusetts has Boston and the Kennedys. Besides the Prez's vacation home, (as we say down here) dere ain't a whole helluva lot.

When I think of a politician, I think of a sleazy grease-ball with his tie undone, sweat dripping from his armpits.

And these two states are the keys to deciding who the next leader of the free (but not interest-free) world will be? Why don't we just stick our heads in Ronco Veg-O-Matics and turn them on Curley-Q? It would take less time and be payable through three easy installments of $19.99.

When I think of a politician, I think of a sleazy grease-ball with his tie undone, sweat dripping from his armpits. He's wiping his slimy hair over his bald spot and accepting a large sum of money from a group of sharp-looking men in Italian suits carrying violin cases.

What do we see on television? A bunch of clean-shaven Madame Toussard's smiling, pressing flesh (Isn't that what got Clinton in trouble?), and kissing babies.

ATTENTION! ATTENTION! K-MART SHOPPERS! On aisle two, for your baby's protection, we now have biodegradable face and lip guards. Don't let a politician put his lips on your baby's, you don't know where they've been. If you do want to know, check out our magazines on aisle three.

Getting back to those vile creatures (reporters), who aren't getting their attention now that the candidates are busy swatting? Most everyone, but those breathing the heaviest sighs are televangelists.

Fortunately for reporters, there is little difference between a politician and a televangelist. Both ask for large sums of money, promise to cure the world of its woes, and have a fanatical following (read: flock) that think they are God's gift to the world. The rest of us are just too stupid to realize it, and both are great for comedy.

Over the past 12 years America has become a "God-less society" and a second-rate economic power under the leadership of these two groups of vile creatures (for those of you scoring at home, that's televangelists and politicians), as reported to us every half-hour on the hour by that other group of vile creatures (yes, reporters).

One group blames the other two for its woes, and whenever someone tries to combine two of them we get people like Pat Robertson and Pat Buchanan.

You decide, should I be appalled at the current state of affairs, or should I kick back, grab a bag of pretzels and a cold one, and laugh at the seriousness paid to this process?

I think I'll kick back because, without a sympathetic Congress, the President "can't do meadow muffins," and enjoy the proceedings.

A wise man once said that the best candidate (NOTE: Feminists, I didn't say "man" (who knows, maybe I'll want to be president someday and I'd hate for the fact I referred to a candidate in the masculine term to ruin all my aspirations)) for office is usually smart enough not to run. But I don't think he had Mario in mind.

possibility that the girl would say no, thereby leaving me with no viable option but to leave Harold C. Crittenden Junior High School forever and go into the woods and become a burk-eating hermit whose only companions would be the gentle and understanding woodland creatures.

"Hey, ZITFACE!" the woodland creatures would shriek in cute little Chip 'n' Dale voices while raining acorns down upon my head. "You wanna DATE? HAHAAHAHAHA."

So the first rule of dating is: Never risk direct contact with the girl in question. Your role model should be the nuclear submarine, sliding silently beneath the ocean surface, tracking an enemy target that does not even begin to suspect that the submarine would like to date it. I spent the vast majority of 1960 keeping a girl named Judy under surveillance, maintaining a minimum distance of 50 locks to avoid the danger that I might somehow get into a conversation with her, which could have led to disaster:

Judy: Hi.

Me: Hi.

Judy: Just in case you have ever thought about having a date with me, the answer is no.

Woodland Creatures:

HAHAHAHAHAHA.

The only problem with the nuclear-submarine technique is that it's difficult to get a date with a girl who has never, technically, been asked. This is why you need Phil Grant. Phil was a friend of mine who had the ability to talk to girls. It was a mysterious superhuman power he had, comparable to X-ray vision. So, after several thousand hours of intense discussion and planning with me, Phil approached a girl he knew named Nancy, who approached a girl named Sandy, who was a direct personal friend of Judy's and who passed the word back to Phil via Nancy that Judy would be willing to go on a date with me. This procedure protected me from direct humiliation, similar to the way President Reagan was protected from direct involvement in the Iran-contra scandal by a complex White House chain of command that at one point, investigators now believe, included his horse.

Thus it was that, finally, Judy and I went on an actual date, to see a movie in White Plains, N.Y. If I were to sum up the romantic ambience of this date in four words, those words would be: "My mother was driving." This made for an extremely quiet drive, because my mother, realizing that her presence was hideously embarrassing, had to pretend she wasn't there. If it had been legal, I think she would have got out and sprinted alongside the car, steering through the window. Judy and I, sitting in the back seat about 75 feet apart, were also silent, unable to communicate without the assistance of Phil, Nancy and Sandy.

After what seemed like several years we got to the movie theater, where my mother went off to sit in the Parents and Lepers Section. The movie was called "North to Alaska," but I can tell you nothing else about it because I spent the whole time wondering whether it would be necessary to amputate my right arm, which was not getting any blood flow as a result of being perched for two hours like a petrified snake on the back of Judy's seat exactly one molecule away from physical contact.

So it was definitely a fun first date, featuring all the relaxed spontaneity of a real-estate closing, and in later years I did regain some feeling in my arm. My point, Eric Knott, is that the key to successful dating is self-confidence. I bet that good-looking girl in your English class would LOVE to go out with you. But YOU have to make the first move. So just do it! Pick up that phone! Call Phil Grant.

Relationships Shouldn't End Identity

No quest seems more important to most of us than our quest for the significant other in our life, that one whom we desire as our steady boyfriend or girlfriend or, perhaps as our spouse. It certainly is a central concern of my life and one which in fulfillment does bring to me the experience of all the best that is caught up in the words "love" and "family."

There is a twist in such significant relationships that bothers me, a twist reflected in the phrases we use like "my girlfriend" or "my husband." There are some who use the words "my" with a kind of desperate ownership that bespeaks an unhealthy dependency and need to control. In wanting the emotional security of a relationship, we often become so dependent that we deny our needs, rights and dreams for the sake of hanging on to our partner. We slowly give over control of our lives to our partner in our desire to please them and maintain some sense of security in that relationship. Once more we hang on to someone else and in so doing, slowly allow our identity to be swallowed up in daily efforts to please the other out of fear of losing them. I once showed a poster to my wife which said "All my tomorrows depend on your love." Her response was, "I don't like it; I wouldn't want that kind of power and responsibility."

I believe that good relationships are meant to help in the fuller development of two person, causing them to become more of what they are God-gifted to be. When one partner diminishes themselves by clutching the other so closely, growth is smothered.

While not my original thought, it is nevertheless true that you can only "have" someone if you are willing to let them go. It is an obvious lesson parents learn about their children; but it is true for all relationships. It is by granting each other full freedom to become their own person, that we discover both our own internal security and the marvelous gift of the other who comes to us freely, unmanipulated and uncontrolled to say, "I want to be with you."

Whether new relationships or old, it might do us well to become aware of roles, patterns, expectations and limits we are clinging to and consider once again the power (and the risk) of letting go.

This Is Enrichment?

In an effort to enrich my mind, and get out of the house more, I have decided to add new and thought-provoking activities to my humdrum schedule. As one of these activities, I chose to see Cinematique's showing of Prospero's Books, a British film by eclectic filmmaker Peter Greenaway.

Greenaway, the master of movies that require Cliff's Notes®, is the same director who produced the equally elusive film The Cook, The Thief, His Wife and Her Lover.

I won't be so pretentious as to make you believe that I understood a second of it. I didn't. I haven't a clue.

Oh, there were a few, okay, two, TWO moments where I felt a little film/audience bonding going on, and just a meager second or two where I thought I actually might know what was happening ... but I have my doubts.

The opening was filled with water—"Water, water, everywhere". A continuous flow of water—from the rain, water from the pool, "organic water" from a young boy/mouse swinging above. It certainly was wet. Wet? Wet you say? Remember: if it's WET, WEAR GLOVES. Was this the missing ingredient? Did I need sterile surgical gloves in order to grasp the concept of this movie? It couldn't have hurt.

They say ignorance is bliss, in this case it's required. Perhaps after I finish my thesis on Shakespeare's The Tempest (on which the movie is based) I might have a clue. But then again, I have a scary feeling if I ever do come to understand this movie there might be something terrible wrong with me. Yeah ... right.

Have You Made Your Easter Weekend Plans?

So long winter blues. Come welcome the rays of spring sunshine with the pulsating sounds of the First Annual North Topsail Beach Music Festival.

This one day concert will feature the sounds of CLARENCE CARTER, THE BREEZE BAND, THE BAND OF OZ, NORTH TOWER and a special performance by DOUG CLARK & THE HOT NUTS, a band recently referred to as "the wildest rock band in the United States" by Perthouse magazine.

The host for this one day beach music festival, set for Easter Saturday (April 18) on Topsail Island, will be comedian The Mad Hatter.

The event is to be co-sponsored by Miller Genuine, Pepsi and the radio station KOOL 98.7, which will broadcast the entire event live until dusk.

Plenty of parking will be available at the concert site and elsewhere on the island. Free buses will also carry concert-goers from designated sites to the festival gates.

No alcohol will be sold on site and glass bottles are banned but coolers will be permitted.

Tickets are now available at many locations, call 328-4745 or 1-800-359-4745. Single tickets are $17.50 in advance, and $22.50 the day of the show (group discounts are available).

Opera House Theatre Company proudly presents the habit-forming musical comedy Nunsense by Dan Goggin on Feb. 23rd through March 1 at Thalian Hall.

Nunsense, a hilarious talent show staged by five nuns as a fund raiser (with audience participation), stars (clockwise from lower left) Paula Davis, Ann Smith, Jenny Moranz, C. Ward Freeman and Kelly Chalaire, and is directed by Brad Moranz. Performances are at 8 p.m.. For reservations call 763-3398.

If You Missed Angel At My Table—Catch It On Video

BY ZACHARY BISACKY
 Movie Reviewer

Where are the real movies? I mean the really good ones. I hate life ... and like movies that come to Wilmington only slightly less. Naturally, most people, especially UNCW students, will attend these horrifying features thinking there's nothing else to choose from (or not thinking at all).

Well, surprisingly enough, there is something else to choose from. College Road Cinema, in association with a group called Cinematique, is providing starving movie-goers of Wilmington with two films a month. These films, usually foreign, are sure to sidestep the mediocrity running rampant in current cinema. Unfortunately, these films only run three days, every other week (Sunday afternoon and Monday and Tuesday evenings). My only advice for those who miss these films is simply not to forget about the phenomenon (or is it the horror) of the video rental.

Due to the postponement of the movie I originally went to see, Europa, Europa, I had no choice but to see the film in its place: Angel At My Table. As it turned out, it was probably one of the most captivating movies I've seen in months. Detailing the life of New Zealand poet/author Janet Frame, this feature is autobiographical in the true sense of the word. That is, it's incredibly thorough with clips from not just one, but three experiential periods of her life.

In the first time-frame she appears as a precocious grammar school student, struggling with the constant sense of being different from the other children, both physically and mentally. She is short, chubby and carries a crop of red hair that could easily be mistaken for a giant basketball. She also comes from an impoverished family of seven, in which domestic violence and the loss of two sisters has a strong emotional effect on her. Through her writing success, she is able to escape by going to another, more advanced school. From here, the film moves into the most powerful and emotional stage in Frame's life.

Upon graduating from college, she is forced to take a job teaching to support herself. But she is extremely timid and insecure from the alienation she has experienced most of her life, and because her main desire is to write, the teaching environment might as well have been that of a coal mine. Thinking there is something wrong with her intense desires for another career, she seeks psychiatric help from a nearby mental hospital. There she is improperly diagnosed as a schizophrenic and is held for eight dreadful years with severely disturbed women. After countless shock treatments and solitary confinement, a writer takes her out of the hospital and gives her shelter and security to write her first novel.

The last stage of her life mainly takes place in Europe, where she meets with a number of different people and cultures and her first love. All of these things in the outside world, however, attempt to transform her and her struggle to push past it all.

Although I had no idea who Frame was, the film was nonetheless extremely engaging. In fact, it was even more interesting not knowing. It shows what concrete experiences a writer can have during their life and how each experience will affect their work.

In conclusion, this film should be on top of any must-see list of all films. Make a point of seeing it, even if it's on video tape.

The House of Blue Leaves will be performed Feb. 20-22 in Kenan Auditorium. Tickets are free to UNCW students. Call 791-9695 for reservations.

By The Powers Vested In Ticketron, U2 Tickets Are Bestowed Upon The Worthy

BY SHANNON DAVIS
 Entertainment Writer

I couldn't believe this moment was finally here. I have been waiting for this opportunity for about 8 years now ... the chance to get U2 tickets. These tickets, for a night of musical heaven, went on sale Saturday for $26.95 (For the Charlotte concert on March 3rd. They are also playing in Atlanta on March 5th and Hampton, Va. on March 7th).

Rumor has it U2 will be doing a stadium tour in the summer with NINE INCH NAILS. Right now the PIXIES are touring with them. This is the closest they will come to Wilmington for a long time. So, of course, to me it is a matter of life and death that I get to see them. If you haven't guessed already, they are my favorite band.

Even though U2 is at the top of my list of favorite bands, and I think Bono is a perfect, god-like creature whose only fault is he hasn't devoted his life to me like I have to him, I will be the first one to admit that Achtung Baby finished the fall that Rattle & Hum started. I know, I know, it hurts me to admit it too.

In the beginning they were the coolest, politically profound band to be found. Their albums Boy, October, War, The Unforgettable Fire, and Under a Blood Red Sky all musically and poetically expressed their strong emotions on their views.

Bono said they would always try and sing these profound songs and some love songs, but they would always be songs for the love of their country. (I know this because I have it on video tape from an interview Bono did on 60 Minutes about four years ago.) So that's why this big switch with Achtung Baby has disturbed everyone so much. The whole album is full of relationship love songs.

U2 did have a transitional period between their stages of profoundness and puppy love. This period was expressed in Joshua Tree and Rattle & Hum.

Joshua Tree was half-a-half, it had three songs on it that hit the pop charts but the rest of it was more like U2's former style. Rattle & Hum was made. I think just to get an album out on the market. It was a "combo album" with their better songs from prior albums, plus a few new songs.

Then, of course, there was their documentary movie Rattle & Hum (which I have a copy of) that made them even more famous. I think this attracted some new followers but, unfortunately it lost some old ones. This leads us to Achtung Baby. I personally don't mind the love songs because I know deep in my heart they were written for me ... yeah, right!

Saturday morning I got ready to wait in line for tickets with my fellow U2 followers. I brought my camera in case I wanted to get a little "predocumentary film," got doughnuts and then met my friends at Record Bar. We waited in line for 2 hours. The line was so long that by the time I got to the omnipotent controller of tickets they had just sold out ... of all the decent seats. The seats I got aren't great but I'm humbly thankful for them.

If they had sold out before I had bought mine, I think I would have attacked the omnipotent ticket controller and smashed him into the omnipotent ticketron computer. No one is going to keep me from Bono this time. The next 13 days until this concert are going to be like the 12 days of Christmas for me. I will do something covertly cool in U2's honor every day to prepare for this sacred musical event. My first vowel will be to take a respectful silence period. Therefore, I won't write until after spring break, when I give you a review of the concert.

Editors note: Bono and the rest of U2 have been warned of Shannon Davis' attendance at their upcoming concert. Cautionary preparations have been made.

Two Fiction Competitions Announced

The deadline for the North Carolina Writers' Network fiction competition is Feb. 29. Winners will be awarded prizes of $100, $75 and $50, and may be published in a North Carolina literary publication.

Novelist and essayist David Bradley will be the final judge, with Ruth Moore and Robin Henley as preliminary judges.

The competition is open to legal residents of North Carolina or a member of the network.

Stories must be original, unpublished, typed and no longer than six double-spaced pages. Two copies of each entry must be submitted. The author's name should not appear on the manuscript. The author's name, address, telephone number and title of story should be typed on a separate sheet.

An entry fee of $3 for current members and $6 for non-members is required. No manuscripts will be returned. Send submissions and entry fee to Alice E. Sink, 1992 Fiction Competition, 1727 Raleigh Road, Lexington, N.C. 27292.

There is also a writing competition for UNCW students currently being held.

Philip Gerard, of the English department, is now accepting submissions for the Sam Ragan poetry prize and the Jesse Reiber short story prize.

Student entries must be previously unpublished, and the original work of the author. Entries will be accepted until 5 p.m. on Friday, Feb. 28, 1992. (Note: date was changed due to the occurrence of spring break.)

Prizes for winning entries will be $50, $30 and $20. Contact Mr. Gerard (ext. 3329) for further information.

'Potty Parity' Bill Gives Women Equal Bathroom Access

BY DIANE HIRTH
Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — It's not equal pay for equal work, but Florida women may soon get a new right — equal access to a restroom.

The Florida Senate on Tuesday unanimously approved a "potty parity" bill that will require all new buildings open to the public to have three women's toilets for every two men's toilets.

The measure is stronger than the one-to-one ratio originally proposed, partly because proponents say it takes women longer to use the bathroom and because they usually are the one who have to take small children with them. The House is expected to pass the measure.

"I want to thank you for standing up for a woman's right to sit down," said Democratic Sen. Helen Gordon Davis, sponsor of potty parity.

Davis said she pushed for the bill because long bathroom lines had made her "a victim of missing the second act of every play or the second half of a game as well as every woman I know."

The usual waiting time to use a sports stadium restroom is eight minutes for women, zero minutes for men, according to a Maryland study. At theaters, women wait for a toilet for as long as 15 minutes, compared to five to seven minutes for men.

Davis wanted to force existing sports stadiums to comply with the new potty parity standard but backed off when confronted with the renovation costs: $15 million for the Orange Bowl, $4 million for Tampa Stadium and $5.7 million for the Gator Bowl.

It's not exactly an issue on par with equal pay: statistics show women earn between 68 and 70 cents for every $1 earned by men. But Davis said she was grateful for what she got — including the absence of bathroom jokes.

"I was prepared for ribbing," she said. "I think it was telling that it was not treated with flippancy."

People In The News. . . .

His African excursion oddly "morphing" into one bad trip, Michael Jackson is about to beat it, just beat it back to the States, flying home Wednesday. It seems the pop star's behavior — which didn't even include crotch-grabbing — has been viewed as an affront to the locals. In Tanzania on Monday, Jackson mystified and ultimately miffed the masses by holding his nose all the time (hey, he paid good money for that perky proboscis!).

Was it something in the air? Or did his diplomatic abilities just sink? A Jackson spokesman tried to explain away the nose grip as a "nervous twitch," then unsuccessfully attempting to shift into spin cycle, added: "Under no circumstances would we be here if we thought your country smelled. You are our roots." Nevertheless, a U.S. Embassy official in Tanzania says the singer, who was outspoken on the continent to shoot a video called "Return to Africa," just "wants to get back to the States."

A sobbing Dana Plato persuaded a Las Vegas judge Tuesday to give her another chance to straighten out her life, narrowly dodging a 6-year prison term for violating probation in a video store holdup last year. The 27-year-old actress from the old "Diff'rent Strokes" sitcom was arrested last month for falsifying prescriptions for Valium, her latest addiction.

"I need help," she told the judge. "I'm sick. I really need help."

Her TV sibling, Todd Bridges, 26, who has had even more problems with the law than she has, spoke up for Plato, telling the judge, "She's exactly where I was three years ago. I think she has finally come to the point in life where she realizes she's sick." District Judge Stephen Huffaker told Plato: "I'm giving you a couple of months to see what happens. If you don't do it, I'm not out anything. The only one out anything is Dana Plato."

Lou Reed has walked on the wild side only to find himself, pushing 50, revered as the stuff of high culture and respectability in Paris. On Tuesday, the rock rebel was named a knight of the French

Order of Arts and Letters. "I'm deeply touched and moved," said Reed, who attended the ceremony with his wife, Sylvia, and his bandmates. "Some have seen you as a star of malaise, perhaps even of evil," French Culture Minister Jack Lang said. "I prefer to see in you a great poet of our anguish and perhaps of our hopes."

Motley Crue is in the market for a new lead singer, after giving the heave-ho to Vince Neil. "After 11 years together, we've parted ways," said bass player Nikki Sixx, who hopes the split "can be as friendly and peaceful as possible, though in this business, that's sometimes a difficult proposition." The heavy metal band recently released a retrospective, aptly titled "Decade of Decadence," but Sixx, guitarist Mick Mars and drummer Tommy Lee (hubby of Heather Locklear) are working on a new album. A Crue spokeswoman says the band had "musical differences" with Neil, who seems more interested in driving race cars than making music of late. No public comment from Neil.

College Mag Makes Waves

BY MURRY FRYMER
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

You're in one of those bookstores with an extensive newspaper and magazine collection, and by chance you pick up a small magazine called Lingua Franca. You look at the logo and quickly put the magazine down again.

Not so fast. Take a look. Trust me.

Lingua Franca, subtitled "A Review of Academic Life," is an odd name. Publisher Jeffrey Kittay, who used to be a professor of French literature at Yale (naturally), chose the name when he started the magazine in June 1990. And, yes, it's a bit pedantic.

Lingua Franca means "common language" or, most specifically, a hybrid collection of words people who speak different languages use to communicate with one another.

Kittay, who had gotten tired of struggling for tenure at Yale, left the university in 1981 and set about finding a new career.

First he tried to solve the problems of the family business, a group of discount stores in the East. He couldn't. They went bankrupt.

He free-lanced academically and pondered his fate. And he read academic magazines.

"I was struck by how dry and sober and dull the writing about academics is," he says now from his office in Mamaroneck, N.Y. "And yet academics aren't really like that. When you hear academic people talking, you hear the wit, the sophistication. These are smart people."

Kittay mulled over trying to run an academic journal and what he would like it to be.

He recalls thinking: "I would try to overcome the disparity between what is printed in other journals — which is very sterile — and the real academic world with its adrenaline, with its mud-slinging, with its blood flowing. The whole circus!"

Kittay, who then knew nothing about publishing a magazine, set about learning. He talked with writers, with design people, with faculty people. Story ideas began to take shape. A lively format reached the drawing board. But no big ideas.

Then one day the light went off in his noggin — the big idea! He would contact all the major college deans — he says there are about 800 of them — and compile a listing of who was being hired where. He would list that information by academic field and the college at which the doctorate had been earned.

"No one else had that information," Kittay says. "And it's something everybody wants to know. Where did all the political science Ph.D.s at Harvard land? How about those at Yale? That, I knew, would make my magazine viable, even to people who were not interested in the articles."

It took a massive amount of work. Only about 400 deans responded at first. But it was a valuable service. When Lingua Franca finally came off the press, the jobtricks list in the back became must reading, a "fixture for the profession."

That was just the back. In the front, Kittay set about producing articles that academics did not find in their usual journals. (Kittay mentions the Chronicle of Higher Education, a hefty paper of record, published weekly.)

Lingua Franca was gossipy. It was political. It was catty.

"Stuff about faculty changing jobs, trying to get along with their chairmen, searching for other goals," he says. And Kittay did not entrust those articles to academics, whose writing he found dry. He sought out successful journalists and assigned the pieces. He hired an editor (Peter Edidin) who had produced Psychology Today and made that academic field a popular consumer topic. (Associate editor Margaret Talbot has now replaced Edidin.)

The June 1990 issue was an advance special. It took a few more months for the magazine to take on its regular bi-monthly schedule.

From the beginning, the topics created controversy, winning an audience of non-academics as well as the professorial crew.

For example, there was the story of "The Candidate." That detailed how one unnamed university went about hiring a minority professor as part of its affirmative-action policy.

The author of the piece, a member of the hiring committee, says the process pretended that all races and ethnic groups were welcome to apply. But that was not true, he says. The job was intended for a minority scholar. Although distinguished white professors were interviewed, and correspondence maintained, they were in fact not seriously considered.

"We showed that universities largely pretend that their hiring is open, when in fact (in certain situations) they are searching for a minority candidate only. It's a myth, and everyone knows it," Kittay says. "Universities are not supposed to be closed, secret places, but they are a priesthood like any other priesthood. And everyone is interested in priesthoods."

The article, which was reprinted in the Wall Street Journal, produced an avalanche of letters, including one from the black professor who was hired at the unnamed university.

Campaign Trail Begins for '92 Race

BY RENEE LOTH
Boston Globe

After months of concentrated focus on cozy New Hampshire, the presidential campaign now spills like a band of refracted light, flashing attention on the 27 states that will hold primaries or caucuses in the next 30 days. And each candidate is clinging fast to his own regional beam of hope.

New Hampshire's ballots were barely tabulated before the campaigns of the five major Democrats and two Republicans began boarding flights to their next battlegrounds. On March 3, just two weeks away, the four corners of the nation will be heard from — Maryland to the East, Georgia in the South, Minnesota up North and Colorado out West — and by March 17 half the Democratic Party's delegates will be chosen.

"This is a very short, deliberately short season," said Ann Lewis, former Democratic Party political director. "The goal was to arrive on a consensus candidate early on." Laughing, she added, "Once again, this is a plan that looks best on paper."

Because each of the four top Democratic candidates has a natural claim to some part of the country — Paul Tsongas in New England, Bill Clinton in the South, Bob Kerrey in the West and Tom Harkin in the Rust Belt — the first imperative for the campaigns will be to define which states are considered important contests.

Most analysts already have conceded Maine's caucuses next Sunday to Tsongas, for example, since Maine has voted the same way as New Hampshire in the last three presidential races.

Tsongas hopes to define his next battleground as Maryland, one of seven states holding contests on March 3. He is headed to Baltimore Wednesday for a rally, even before capitalizing on his New Hampshire showing with a fund-raiser Wednesday night in New York. The former U.S. senator from Massachusetts has been on the Maryland airwaves since Sunday with an introductory campaign commercial, showing him "swimming against the current" in an indoor pool.

Still, Tsongas' campaign manager Dennis Kanin, aware that his candidate must answer concerns that he is merely a regional phenomenon, said Tsongas also would compete March 3 in Washington state, Colorado and even Georgia. "This is a national campaign," he said. "We'll be everywhere."

On the Republican side, the insurgent challenger Patrick Buchanan was scrambling to assemble his schedule for the coming weeks. On primary eve, he targeted Georgia's March 3 primary as his next proving ground. In Georgia, Buchanan will have the protest vote all to himself, since former Ku Klux Klanman David Duke does not appear on a ballot until the South Carolina primary March 7.

As he surged in New Hampshire Tuesday, Buchanan targeted Georgia as his Rubicon. "You'll see the sea level rising," he said. Republican sources in New Hampshire and Washington alike said President Bush's reelection campaign was unprepared for the result Tuesday night and uncertain where to take the campaign next, but that the realization had dawned on the White House that the president must put aside government to attend vigorously to politics in the weeks ahead.

Merle Black, professor of politics and government at Emory University in Atlanta, said Buchanan was so far "not visible" in Georgia, and he noted that his state was not the angry incubator for a protest campaign New Hampshire was.

"The economy is in recession here, but it's not a New Hampshire situation," Black said. "It has brought Bush's popularity down in the South, but I think the president would be stronger in the South than in any other region in the country right now."

For Arkansas Gov. Clinton, the South looms large. With a respectable showing in New Hampshire Tuesday, Clinton, who has been dogged by questions about his personal life, now moves to more friendly territory, though not without scars. Ironically, just as Tsongas must prove he can win outside his regional base, a shaken Clinton must prove he can win inside his.

With Clinton's solid second-place showing in New Hampshire, "I think he'll be in excellent shape in the South," Black said. "Tsongas is unknown, and Democratic leaders down here do not want to nominate another Massachusetts Democrat."

Clinton is also helped in Georgia by a strong field organization and the endorsements of Gov. Zell Miller and Sen. Sam Nunn.

The Georgia primary is also seen as a bellwether for Super Tuesday, one week later, when voters in 11 states — seven of them in the South or Southwest — go to the polls. Sen. Kerrey of Nebraska and Sen. Harkin of Iowa, whom some have nicknamed "the prairie dogs" for their Western roots, are expected to continue to battle for the right to be everyone's second choice if Tsongas or Clinton proves to lack staying power.

Although it is a small contest — less than 1 percent of the total Democratic delegates are at stake — South Dakota takes on some significance because it is the only contest during the week of Feb. 22. Both Harkin and Kerrey hail from states that border on South Dakota, and both have been running campaign commercials in the relatively inexpensive media markets there.

Any candidate not competing in South Dakota, campaign officials said Tuesday, risks forfeiting a week of media attention at the gateway of other Western states where primaries are being held on March 3: Utah, Washington, Idaho and Colorado. The West may also prove surprisingly fertile for the unorthodox campaign of former Gov. Jerry Brown of California, who has vowed to continue his candidacy through the party convention.

Although the economy continues to dominate the national agenda, regional issues such as the environment can take a strong hold in Western states, where recessionary conditions do not rival those of New Hampshire.

"The environment is very important," said Kerrey's political director, Chris Sauter. "And should Clinton decide to compete strongly in the West, his environmental record in Arkansas will be problematic."

Harkin's spokesman, Barry Piatt, said Tuesday that the process now was one of counting delegates, and that a tiny number — just 12 in New Hampshire — had been allocated so far.

"I think everybody is marching right out of this one," Piatt said. "It was so much fun. Let's do it all again."

SGA UPDATE

The Little Seahawk

Krista Habecker, Freshman Class Senator, Roger Hyman, Freshman Class Senator, and Joe Mitchell of the Student Grievance Committee have come up with a program for in coming freshmen, temporarily referred to as The Little Seahawk. The program is designed to make the transition from High School to College a little smoother said Hyman. "It's not mandatory, it's voluntary," Hyman continued. The board of directors for the program hope to have a table in the University Center next week to survey upperclassmen and answer questions about participation in the program.

Information about the program will be included in the freshman housing packets. It is designed to offer support about classes, professors and any general college questions. Stressed in the literature students receive will be the fact that students are not to utilize their "mentors" for rides to the beach or to the mall. Anyone with ideas to name the program should contact Joe Mitchell in the SGA office at 395-3553.

Not Another Net Loss

My tape recorder was dead. My pen was out of ink. And my mouth remained wide open.

The ball hit net. Let's not forget! It traveled 41 feet. It did so with no time remaining. It was tossed by a freshman.

Unbelievable. UN-BE-LIEV-ABLE!!

Nobody, I repeat nobody, wake me up!!

The ball hit net. Let's not forget!

The court was mobbed with fans. They climbed over the press table. They hung on the rim. They jumped on the players, the coaches, and cheerleaders, anybody who was standing still.

They swarmed from the left. They crashed in from the right. The fans buried Seahawk Chris Meighen in a field of leaping bodies and outstretched hands that exchanged pats on the back and mid-air high fives.

Trask was rocking. The applause meter in the corner went off the scale, flashing and blaring a high pitch scream. The scoreboard remained frozen, glaring in bright yellow lights the final tally, UNCW 88, Visitors 87.

The ball hit net. Let's not forget!

Morning Star reporter Chuck Carree and I stood on the court. We pointed. We stared at the spot on the floor where Meighen had tossed his half-court heave at the basket.

"Right, here," Chuck said.

"Yeah," I replied.

"I still can't believe he made it," Chuck said.

"He just stood there."

"Yeah!," I replied shaking my head.

PAN-DA-MON-IUM!!!

The ball hit net. Let's not forget!

This wasn't suppose to happen. This wasn't the storyline any of the reporters figured on writing.

The game was over three seconds ago. American clutch center Craig Sedmak had won it with his three-pointer. The Eagles had a two-point lead, 87-85.

Missed free-throws were the key, we would point out in our stories tomorrow on why the Seahawks had lost again. We would say Meighen had blown the game for the green and gold, bricking two free-throw attempts with 12 seconds left.

UNCW squandered five, six, seven, eleven point leads in the half. They had let their opponent escape again, same old story.

The American players were the victors. They were jumping up and down after their hero, Sedmak, who had sunk his trey. The moment was theirs. It was a great win on the road!

Not!!

Enter trumpets and fanfare. Slow motion go to work.

Tim Shaw stood out of bounds. His first choice, Keith Adkins, was smothered by a defender. Shifting his eyes down court, he spotted Meighen open.

He fired a cross-court bullet to the freshman, who was 45 feet from the basket. Two Eagle defenders leaped quickly high in the rookie's face. He took a dribble. He set his feet and launched the ball with a tick left on the clock. The horn sounded as the orange round object made its descent.

Swish!!

Roooooooooooo!!! Instant fame.

The ball hit net. Let's not forget!!

"I just remember a couple of American guys looking at me as they turned their heads," Meighen said in the press room, with a sheepish almost embarrassed grin on his face.

"They looked back at me and their heads dropped," I said. "Oh, my gosh, it's in!"

Swish!!

In? Yes, it was in. Not with a rattle, a swirl, or a high bounce off the metal steel rim, but a... Swish!!

... where I was sitting." AU coach Chris Knoche said, "It was true all the way."

The ball hit net. Let's not forget.

It was the perfect sequel, even better than the contest in Bender Arena Jan. 20. A triple overtime was replaced with a miracle shot. If this had been a Hollywood script, Lucas and Spielberg would fight to direct it.

"Ok, fans, it's Presidents' Day and your team is losing to American. You start heading towards the exits after Eagle Sedmak hits his three-point shot," the director would below. "Look dejected. Shake your heads. Throw up your hands in disgust."

"Good. Now, glance at the clock again and linger at the door leading to the parking lot. Everybody sigh. Great!!"

"Now follow the path of the ball with your eyes. Start to turn away and then go nuts. It's in. It's in. Rush on the court, mob the players, and yell at journalists to take this win and stuff it."

"Super. Print it. That's a wrap."

For Meighen, this was a night to remember.

For the fans, a college basketball story, they will recall again and again.

It was, undeniably, the greatest finish in Trask Coliseum.

It hit all net. Let's never forget!!

Weight, Aerobics Rooms Get Facelift

BY PATRICK FOWLER
Sports Editor

As Hanz and Franz would say: "It's time to pump, you up!"

That is the idea behind the university's $50,000 two-part construction project to improve the athletic facilities in Hanover Gym.

The projects, which begin construction on April 30, will expand the existing weight room and install a new aerobic workout area.

"We are really excited about the changes that will take place," said intramural director Elaine Penn. "These new facilities have been sorely needed for a long time."

The weight room, located in the back of Hanover Hall behind the gym, will be enlarged by knocking down the existing wall between the current weight area and the aerobics room next door.

The additional 50 feet of space, which doubles the weight area's current size, will be used to house new nautilus equipment.

Additional free weights, stairmasters, and life cycles are being ordered for the larger facility. The smaller weight room located near the south side bleachers will be used as a storage area. Current mirrors, bars, and aerobic equipment will also be removed from the old exercise area.

The expanded weight room will have two double door entrances to the equipment, one on the right, the other on the left.

Meanwhile, a second wall, will be constructed 15 feet away from the gym entrance to the new weight area. The space will be a small hallway, for exiting purposes.

The new aerobic workout space will take most of the second floor on the north side bleachers. Walls will be constructed in front of the current railing structures so exercisers can enter the facility from either stairwell leading to the second floor. The intramural and supply offices will not be affected and will remain where they are.

"I'm really excited about the aerobics," Penn said. "They've been so popular with the students. We will staff 6 instructors to serve more hours since the demand for class is so high."

The dual projects, which will be ready for student use in the second summer session and 1993 fall semester, have been under advisement and consideration for some time, but gained serious consideration last summer.

The decision to construct or improve the new facilities was made this fall by Chancellor James Leutze and Vice Chancellor of Business Affairs R. O. Walton Jr. The project was budgeted by Assistant Vice Chancellor of Business Affairs, Tim Jordan.

According to Walton, cost to support the new, succent facilities, came from "gifts from the university, the intramural department, and excess receipts."

The excessive receipts refer to the extra money obtained from student fees obtained in over-enrollment of incoming students to the university this year.

Several outside contractors have made bids on the two separate projects but no one at this time has been given an official nod to the job.

Work will be underway shortly, to convert this second level tier into an aerobic workout room. The weight room is also going to be expanded and added too for next fall.

"Do you believe in miracles?"

Many Seahawk fans were Monday night after freshman forward Chris Meighen hit a 41-foot three-point shot at the buzzer to beat American, 88-87.

"I just remember a couple of the American guys looking at me and they turned their heads," Meighen said. "They looked back at me and their heads just dropped. I said, 'Oh my gosh, it's in.'"

The final play was set up with the execution of a double screen to free one of the point guards or forwards. Shaw, who inbounded the ball, checked off junior Keith Adkins, who was blanketed by American Donald Grant.

Meighen, meanwhile broke free from his man at half court. Shaw delivered the ball, and the Nutter Fort, West Virginian product took one dribble and let the shot fly.

The Seahawks (4-17, 11-13), despite the dramatic win, left the door open for an Eagles comeback. UNCW connected on just seven of their last twelve free-throw attempts.

The Eagles, given new life, capitalized in a hurry, turning a six point deficit into a two point lead with seconds remaining.

Meighen, the hero himself, bricked two free-throws with 12 seconds left in the contest. The miss left UNCW clinging to a one point lead, 85-84.

The lead vanished on Eagle junior Eagle center Craig Sedmak's three-point shot with three seconds remaining. American led for the first time in the second half, 87-85.

"When I missed those two free-throws," Meighen said, "all I was hoping was that I would get another chance."

The Seahawks led the entire second half and most of the first. Junior Keith Adkins came off the bench early to hit five of seven from the field, two of three from the three-point range.

The Paintsville, Kentucky native finished with 21 points for the night. UNCW shot 71 percent from the field but led American (7-49-14) by just three, 42-39, at the break.

"I hit a couple of shots, Adkins said, "and everything was feeling good."

American Brian Gilgeous led all scorers with 27 points. UNCW senior Matt Fish was the Seahawks' top man with 22 points.

Saturday, UNCW defeated George Mason in another close affair 67-64. Friday, the Seahawks lost to in-state rival Campbell, 62-58.

Lady Cagers Drop Two Over Weekend

BY JIM CLARK
Assistant Sports Editor

Last weekend UNCW traveled to George Mason University and American University for two games, but they only showed up for one—the second half of each game.

After the previous two games (James Madison University and University of Richmond), it appeared the Lady Seahawks had overcome their habit of playing 30 minutes of the scheduled 40, but this was not the case.

In both games the defensive pressure exerted by GMU and AU was enough to totally disrupt the offense and result in quick, easy baskets. Before Tynes could call time-out, her team was down ten.

In both games over the weekend UNCW and its opponents played even in the second half. Unfortunately, the score wasn't close at the half.

The even play in the second half was not a result of the other team pulling its starters and playing its second string.

In fact, GMU played its starters a good portion of the game and substituted freely in the second half, keeping fresh legs on the court in a game long decided.

In Fairfax, VA, Saturday, GMU defeated UNCW 71-54. Leading the way for the Lady Seahawks was Lorraine Cordaway.

She finished with a team-high 13 points. Hannah Grady pulled down eight rebounds.

Monday, in the nation's capital, The American shot the lights out, running out to a 13 point halftime lead.

AU shot 64 percent in the first half, holding UNCW to 30 percent.

The Lady Eagle finished the night shooting 58 percent from the field.

Zandra Harris, Joanna Chandler, and Pat Martin led the way for UNCW. Harris poured in 24, on 10 of 15 from the field and four of four from the line.

Chandler came off the bench to score 13 and snag a game-high seven rebounds. Martin added 14 points.

Tonight at Trask Coliseum the Lady Seahawks host Charleston Southern, a team the UNCW women's program has never lost to.

The Seahawks have won 17 straight matches against the Lady Buccaneers. UNCW won by 32 and 40 points in both meetings last season, 77-37 and 90-58.

UNCW is still searching for their first win. The squad is winless in 21 tries, a new school record for most losses in a season.

The Seahawks are at home for three games. UNCW will face and meet William and Mary and Old Dominion on Saturday and Monday.

The Tribe slipped by the Seahawks a month ago, 63-60. Old Dominion won handily on their home floor by 22 points, 97-70.

Greeks Protest Move To Dean of Students By Bryan

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor in Chief

The UNCW administration's pick to fill a new Greek advisor position met with such opposition by members of the Greek Presidents Council Feb. 25 that a new candidate will be chosen.

In the emotion-packed meeting of the council, Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs William Bryan told the members that university advising over the Greeks would be transferred to the dean of students office, and that John Johnson, currently the director of residence life, would be the new Greek advisor on July 1.

The council said no way. Johnson has no experience in Greek advising, and what's worse, he isn't even a Greek himself, they said. They also said the system is working fine the way it is.

The Greek system is currently advised by Lanita Hanson, who is the director of the student activities office.

Johnson decided not to take the position a few days after the council meeting.

Bryan said that the change to the dean of students office will be made despite the opposition, but the Greeks will help in choosing the new advisor. A committee composed of Greek students and members of the university student affairs division will begin planning a national search for the advisor next week, he said.

Several members of the Greek Presidents Council said that the main prerequisite for the position should be that the candidate is a Greek.

Bryan said the change will allow the university to give more attention to the Greek system as well as the non-Greek programs run by the student activities office. "Something suffers when [Hanson's] time is divided between student activities and the Greek system," Bryan said.

The Greek system has grown 125% in the past five years, Bryan said. The number of Greeks at UNCW has doubled since 1989, when Hanson was hired. "We're at the point that we need a full-time Greek system," he said.

The advisor's official title will be assistant dean of students, and the job description will involve more than just advising Greeks, said Dean of Students Pat Leonard.

Hanson said that while she spends an estimated 65-75% of her time working with the Greek system, she hasn't neglected other student activities projects. "I put a lot of time in... and I think we've done a good job..." she said.

As the Greek system has grown, Hanson says she has delegated more responsibility to students in the organizations, leaving her more time for other projects. "We've started a real weaning process," she said. "The long-term goal is to become a self-functioning system."

Hanson also doubts that the new advisor will have more time for Greeks. "That person won't have any more time than I do," she said.

The move would also mean more time for the office of student activities to sponsor and direct programs geared toward the entire student body, Bryan said.

Leonard said that one new priority for the more streamlined student activities office could be to provide more recreational opportunities for students who are under age 21. Hanson said that the staff in the student activities office will begin planning what to do with their new free time soon.

Greek students should have been consulted before the decision was made, said Beckie Haynes, chairperson of the Greek Presidents Council. "We're disappointed with the administration and how they've gone through the decision making process," she said to the members of the SGA Senate Monday.

Haynes said that the change would mean less autonomy for the Greek system. "The dean of students office" would have a very fine leash" on Greek activities, she said. She cited the fact that the students were not consulted before the decision was made as evidence that Greek self-governance might be in jeopardy.

Bryan denied that any autonomy would be lost because of the move.

As far as consulting students before the decision, Bryan said that he wouldn't do anything differently than he did. The decision was an administrative one, and one that only he could make, he said.

Candidates Bring Diverse Experience To Race

Lee Person

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

"I'm tired of all the bickering involved with the campaign."

Even if Lee Person is tired with all the bickering, he is running for Student Body President.

Person has been involved in SGA for two years. In those two years, he has served as Freshman Class Senator, Sophomore class senator, manager of the Student Consignment Bookstore and as a member of the Budget and Planning committee, the Consignment Bookstore committee and the Constitution committee. Person has also been involved in national and international student government, as a University Union Information Center attendant, and in church activities and Boy Scouts of America.

Though Person has been active in SGA while at UNCW, he is a Teaching Fellow, majoring in Middle School Education.

Person said that he is pursuing work at UNCW that will enable him to become a social studies teacher. "Even though I'm not pursuing it, I'll remain politically active. I'll work on campaigns. That is what I have done in the past and it was a good experience."

Person said that this year has been a productive one for SGA and as a body they have done a lot to be proud of. "I'm proud of everything."

"Two big accomplishments for SGA this year have been the consignment bookstore and the ropes course being funded for the Discover Center.

"The University Bookstore gauged the students forever, people worked hard to help the student body and we gave the money back to the students."

"I'm proud of us funding the ropes course. We came together and made it work. This is the most beautiful school and the ropes course will be the best." Person said that if he is president, he plans to make communication better. "There needs to be better communication between SGA committees and students. There has to be a better way than fliers. I want to make it a better program."

Person also is interested in giving students more things to do on the weekends. "Something has to be done about this. A lot of students consider this a 'suitcase college'. They come here and go to school during the week and go home every weekend."

Joe Mitchell

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor in Chief

After three years in the Student Government Association, the last one spent as student services coordinator, Joe Mitchell touts a long list of accomplishments. This month he plans to add student body president to his resume.

The confident Mitchell said that this year has been his most productive one, and the most productive for SGA. "I've done ten times more than I said I would do" as student services coordinator, he said. "What I set out to do, I did."

In the past year, Mitchell was involved in two large student government programs: the SGA consignment bookstore, and the new legal services program.

The bookstore project began last fall, and was in operation in December and January. The store provided an alternative to the University Bookstore for students to buy and sell textbooks. Mitchell called the project a success despite its losing money. The loss in money was worth providing the service to students, he said.

A legal services program began this spring. Through the program, students can get free legal advice from a local attorney who comes to the SGA office in the University Union for a few hours per week. Mitchell said that he spearheaded the project, and that the initial student response has been good. "That's the accomplishment that I am most proud of," he said.

Mitchell said he has also been a key player in campus recycling programs, and in the development of the SGA student discount cards. The discount cards allow UNCW students to get discounts from some local businesses.

Mitchell said that his accomplishments have been the result of hard and consistent work. "I haven't worked for a day and then take a few days off," he said. "I've worked for [the students] every day."

If elected, Mitchell will expand existing programs and try to implement a few more, he said.

One idea he had was for a fall version of the Spring Fling festivals that are popular at many colleges and universities. He said the festival could include cash prizes for participating student organizations.

One administrative addition he said he would make would be the creation of an SGA "Cabinet" consisting of members of the executive board and the Senate committee chairs.

Finally, Mitchell said that he would change SGA from a bureaucracy to an organization accessible to the whole student body, he said. "The students own SGA and they should be able to come to us with their problems," he said.

Curtis Wilson

BY DAVID BURKE
Editor in Chief

Student Body President Curtis Wilson is running for re-election, but you wouldn't know it by looking around campus. He has no flyers on display, no chalk messages on the sidewalks, no soap box in front of the Union. In fact, he has no campaign to speak of at all, except for his personality.

Whether he realizes it or admits it, Wilson is a politician, through and through. In a trip between the University Union and the University Center, he shakes lots of hands and greets lots of people.

His campaign style seems to reflect his style in office. Intensity seems to be lost in favor of a cool style of management with plenty of delegation of power. Wilson says that the system has worked, and that this is a "banner year" for SGA.

He credits an "intelligent and well-motivated" staff (a staff which includes Student Services Coordinator Joe Mitchell, one of Wilson's opponents in the race) for many of his accomplishments, but he says that his leadership made it all work.

Wilson's accomplishments haven't come without a price however. "As far as I know, I've spent more money than any executive officer in SGA history..." he said.

Indeed he has. Wilson himself estimates that he's spent about $50,000 in student fees this year. That's about $20,000 more than the president before him. Those figures make the executive account one of the biggest consumers of this year's SGA money.

Wilson says that students have gotten their money's worth. "I can justify every penny," he said.

Some of those pennies went to fund the renovation of the SGA office (if you don't know what the color "kabuki" looks like, check out the SGA office walls), a change Wilson said was necessary for the new image he wanted for SGA. The executive account also funded programs like the "Take a Faculty/Staff to Lunch" program and the Best Faculty Member of the Year program.

The account is also footing the bill for an SGA banquet for all the members of the Student Government Association and their families.

True to his campaign style, Wilson has an ironic goal for next year as president. He plans to "lower my standards somewhat."

"I had a small burnout this year" from students who didn't share his enthusiasm for SGA projects, he said. Next year, he said he plans to lower his frustration level and take the office of president a little less seriously.

Two UNCW Students Killed In Accidents

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

Two UNCW students were killed during Spring Break. Michael Monroe Blanton, 21, drowned. Timothy Charles Duncan, 19, was killed when the plane he was flying crashed.

Duncan's plane, a Cessna 172 single engine plane crashed approximately 100 yards from the runway at Topsail Scenic Flights in Topsail Beach. Ron Perozzi of the North Topsail Beach police told the Wilmington Morning Star the plane crashed only seconds after taking off and Duncan was dead on the scene.

Perozzi said, in an interview with the Raleigh News and Observer, that the plane had trouble gaining altitude, banked to the left and crashed in a swamp.

Duncan, a resident of Wilmington, had rented the plane from ISO-Aero in Wilmington and flown to the airstrip to pick up three passengers for a day-long trip to take aerial photos of Topsail Island, the Star-News reported.

The Federal Aviation Administration is investigating the crash and possible engine problems with the plane.

Blanton, also of Wilmington, drowned apparently by accident during a trip to Key West, Florida.

Blanton was last seen alive at 1:30 a.m. last Monday morning when he was asleep on a hammock a few feet from the ocean, stated the News and Observer. Blanton was part of a group that was camping on the shore of an inland bay approximately one mile from the Key West city limits.

The News and Observer reported Blanton's roommate Michael D. Vick discovered the body a few feet from the shore approximately six hours later.

Students may sign books located outside the University Union living room. They will be presented to the families of both students.

Any interested student may apply for this ten hour per week paid position by coming by the Alternatives! office in Room 104 of the University Union and picking up an application packet, or by calling Alternatives! at 395-3683. Applications should be picked up as soon as possible and must be returned to the Alternatives! office no later than 5:00 pm Wednesday, April 1st.

SENIOR AWARD

Nominations are now open for the Senior Leadership Award. This award is open to all UNCW seniors graduating between May and December 1992 with a cumulative grade point average of at least 3.0. The student who receives the Senior Leadership Award will be selected based on the following criteria: a demonstrated ethical, creative, flexible and motivational leadership style, involvement in campus life and in community service, and academic success.

The recipient in 1989 was Reika Martin, a Chemistry major nominated by ROTC. The 1990 recipient was Christine Siemenda, nominated by the Office of Student Activities and the History Department. The 1991 recipient was Gladys Diggs, a English Secondary Education major nominated by Heather Smith (University Union Administration office). All three demonstrated their leadership abilities at UNCW and through community service.

The award includes a cash stipend of $400 provided by the UNCW Alumni Association and a personal plaque provided by The Leadership Center. In addition, the winner's name goes on a roster plaque that is displayed in The Leadership Center.

Applications are available in The Leadership Center. The application and two letters of recommendation must be returned to The Leadership Center located in University Union room 212 by March 30, 1992. For more information, call The Leadership Center at 395-3877.

Clinton, Tsongas Race Heats Up

BY CURTIS WILKIE
Boston Globe

CHICAGO — After playing to his strength across the South, Gov. Bill Clinton of Arkansas is in good position to move his freshly minted populist message northward over the next seven days and turn the race for the Democratic presidential nomination into a romp.

The setting for next Tuesday's primaries in Illinois and Michigan, where working-class values prevail among Democrats, looks almost as grim for the party's apostle of business, Paul E. Tsongas, as the stretch of Dixie where he was wiped out Tuesday. And the two industrial states offer no real opening for the third candidate left in the race, Jerry Brown.

Clinton's national campaign manager, David Wilhelm, was sanguine about the situation at lunch here Tuesday as he followed reports from the field where the Arkansas governor was piling up impressive margins in all the primary states outside New England. There will be no change, Wilhelm said, in the strategy that presents Clinton as the candidate of the middle class and Tsongas as a crypto-Republican.

The approach, which has worked splendidly for Clinton since he adopted it two weeks ago, was not developed earlier, Wilhelm said, because "it did not turn into a two-man race with Tsongas until then."

Through the long weeks of competition in New Hampshire, both Clinton and Tsongas billed themselves as "outsider" candidates who shared a desire to "change the Democratic Party's attitudes toward economic growth. But a sequence of primaries in states responsive to a working-class message converged this month with the disappearance of Sen. Bob Kerrey of Nebraska and Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa from the race, leaving Tsongas as the most formidable obstacle to Clinton.

Tsongas has been proud of his claim to be the "pro-business" candidate in the race. But he set himself up for destruction in this month's primaries nearly a year ago when, in Denver on May 1 — the day after he announced his candidacy — he attacked the Democratic Party for encouraging "corporation-bashing, class warfare and populism." Those are the very tools that are now being used against him.

Clinton's aggressive tactics have smacked of class warfare. He now regularly depicts Tsongas as the representative of what James Carville, one of Clinton's strategists, calls "the elite, Volvo wing of the party." Clinton has also become an exponent of populism, saying that his "people-based economics" are composed of more flesh and blood than Tsongas' proposals for tax incentives for corporations to stimulate jobs.

Clinton's offensive fits the demographics of Illinois and Michigan, where nouveau Democratic theory has never had much appeal and unemployment hangs at more than 8 percent of the work force in both states.

Clinton already had a broad-based organization in place in Illinois, including prominent black leaders as well as forces from Chicago's old Democratic machine. Illinois politicians have a reputation for expediency, and independent sources here said that many who were not already on board would be clambering to get on the Clinton express this week. Chicago's mayor, Richard M. Daley, who was believed to have wanted Gov. Mario Cuomo of New York to run, has maintained his neutrality so far.

In Michigan, Hurkin's decision to drop out Monday left organized labor in a quandary. The United Auto Workers, the state's most powerful union, has long held grievances with Clinton over policy disputes in Arkansas. But Tsongas, who opposes legislation that would prevent employers from hiring replacements for striking workers, offers little consolation to labor interests.

Despite his triumphs in Massachusetts and Rhode Island Tuesday, Tsongas has become so battered that Brown is threatening to replace him as the alternative to Clinton.

Before the harsh clash between Tsongas and Clinton spilled poison into their relationship, Tsongas told a reporter three days before the New Hampshire primary that he liked Clinton too much to lead a bitter-end struggle to deprive the Arkansas governor of the nomination. In recent days, Tsongas has expressed discomfort with the negative tone he has had to take in the fight with Clinton.

Brown, however, is a veteran of a national stop-the-bandwagon movement. In 1976, when he was governor of California, Brown was enlisted as a late entry to try to block Jimmy Carter from the nomination. He won several primaries, but fell short that year.

This year, Brown is still busy. He recently formed an ad hoc alliance with the Rev. Jesse L. Jackson and ran television ads aimed at black voters. As he broadened his constituency, Brown ran better than Tsongas in some Southern areas Tuesday.

Yet Brown is an unlikely rallying point for the unhappy politicians in the Washington-New York corridor who still would like to stop Clinton. Brown's advocacy of a flat tax — a proposal so peculiar that David Duke says Brown stole the idea from him — probably puts off most establishment figures.

Moreover, Brown's physical and spiritual home, California, is a counterpoint to next week's battleground in the industrial Midwest.

If he is to overtake Tsongas, Brown will have to wait for the Connecticut primary in two weeks and for more primaries in Western states. But by then, it may be too late to challenge Clinton.

Suspect Carrier Eludes Navy

BY MARK THOMPSON
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

WASHINGTON — A North Korean cargo vessel suspected of carrying Scud missiles bound for Iran or Syria eluded a U.S. Navy fleet and docked undetected at an Iranian port, U.S. officials said Tuesday.

Independent naval experts were dumbfounded by the Navy's failure to intercept the ship. One suggested the interception was called off to avoid upsetting U.S. allies in the region.

Pentagon officials denied that. "We were certainly looking for it, right up until the time we found it in Bandar Abbas," Pentagon spokesman Pete Williams said in an interview.

At a minimum, he said, U.S. ships wanted to challenge the freighter's movements and raise questions about its cargo. That would let North Korea know the United States objected to its arms exports, even though, under international law, the ship would have been allowed to continue, he said.

Apparently, the Pentagon — after leaking news of the vessel and of U.S. plans to intercept it late last week — was outwitted when the ship didn't proceed directly to the Iranian port of Bandar Abbas, midway through the Strait of Hormuz. "It either followed a circuitous route or perhaps it hugged the coastline and wasn't picked out of the heavy coastal traffic in that area," Williams said.

He said the hunt for the Daehung Ho was not the "highest priority" for the 22 Navy ships in the region, whose primary goal is to enforce the U.N.-sanctioned embargo against Iraq. While a U.S. ship located the North Korean vessel in the Indian Ocean last week, it was later lost, he said.

Naval experts were stunned by the Pentagon's failure to track and halt the ship, especially in the narrow strait linking the Gulf of Oman to the Persian Gulf.

"It makes our Navy look like a bunch of monkeys making love to a football," said Eugene Carroll Jr., a retired rear admiral who now serves as deputy director of the Center for Defense Information, a private group critical of many Pentagon policies.

"There were more than 20 warships, dozens of airplanes and helicopters, satellite intelligence coming from the CIA, the Defense Intelligence Agency and the National Security Agency," he said. "They could have tracked it foot by foot by foot."

Carroll said he believed orders were given to abandon the hunt to avoid upsetting U.S. allies in the Middle East. "I think it was politically inconvenient to find it," he said.

"It's unbelievable," said Norman Polmar, a naval scholar and author. "With the air, surface and submarine capabilities we have in the Indian Ocean and Persian Gulf we should have been able to keep track of that ship."

Carroll, who spent some of his 37 years in the Navy supervising U.S. military operations in and around the Persian Gulf, said the vessel could have been tracked even if it had tried to hide along the coastlines of Iran and Pakistan or among the islands there.

Navy officials, speaking anonymously, denied that any decision was made to let the ship escape. "We know how to do this, and if we had really wanted to capture that ship we would have," one officer said, saying their focus has been on other ports through which most Iraqi-bound cargo is headed.

Since U.N. economic sanctions were imposed against Iraq following its August 1990 invasion of Kuwait, the Navy has queried by radio more than 13,000 ships in the region and boarded about 3,700 of them to check their contents.

The Navy's embarrassment over the missed ship comes exactly a month after one of its submarines struck a Russian sub off the northern coast of Russia. That incident left the Navy in the awkward position of trying to explain why it was continuing such close surveillance now that the Cold War is over.

Bush Election Battle Begins

BY MICHAEL KRANISH
Boston Globe

WASHINGTON — Pat Buchanan's failure to win any of the eight Super Tuesday primaries seemed to extinguish whatever faint hope he had of wresting the Republican nomination from President Bush. Now Bush's battle is to try to put back together the fragile coalition that elected him in 1988 and that has been deserting him in droves.

That coalition includes conservative Reagan Democrats, up-for-grabs independents and right-wing Republicans. All three groups have been drawn to Buchanan, and about half of Buchanan's supporters said in exit polls that they would vote for a Democrat in the fall or sit out the election.

Bush must try to rebuild his shattered coalition by urging Republicans to join him in an attack on the Democratic-controlled Congress.

The strategy is aimed at the November election. Discussion at the White House on Tuesday centered on polls saying that Bush's approval rating has dropped to 39 percent and that either leading Democrat, Paul E. Tsongas or Bill Clinton, could beat Bush if the election were held now.

White House officials publicly dismiss such polls, noting that Bush once was 17 points behind Michael S. Dukakis in the 1988 campaign. But they privately worry about the quick erosion of Bush's popularity as a result of the poor economy and withering attacks from the left and the right.

To try to put an end to Bush's slide in popularity, the White House is betting Bush's future on what is known as the "after March 20 strategy."

That is the date by which Bush challenged Congress to pass his economic growth package. Congress instead is likely to send Bush a package that the president — still hurting from his broken "no new taxes" pledge — will veto because it includes tax increases.

The strategy is based on the beliefs that the wide range of potential Bush voters do not want higher taxes and that Bush can tar both Congress and the expected Democratic nominee, Clinton, who has supported a tax increase on the wealthy in exchange for a middle-income tax cut.

But the strategy has its potential pitfalls. After Bush voices the Democratic plan that would raise taxes on people making more than $85,000, the Democrats are likely to come back with a proposal to raise taxes only on millionaires, forcing Bush to either accept a tax that he views as political poison or take the side of the very wealthiest Americans in a "fairness" battle that he probably cannot win.

As the White House contemplates its next move, Buchanan continues to collect about a third of the Republican vote, as he did Tuesday. White House officials tried to put the best face on Buchanan's surprisingly strong showing in Massachusetts, attributing it to the state's economic downturn and the barrage of anti-Bush commercials that voters heard during the New Hampshire primary.

White House aides, meanwhile, preferred to focus on Bush's strong showing in Louisiana, which some aides had feared he might lose. Instead, Bush soundly beat Buchanan and buried former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke in his home state.

The trouncing of Duke pleased White House officials who worried that he would try to wage a third-party candidacy that could have harmed Bush in the fall.

While Buchanan has not won a primary, his candidacy has clearly thrown the president off balance, forcing Bush to fight a two-front war and making it difficult to talk to the Democrats.

Instead, as Bush courts conservative voters needed to win the primaries, he has spent much of his time yielding to Buchanan on issues, looking like a panicked and pandering president. Bush fired the head of the National Endowment for the Arts after Buchanan complained about it. Bush admitted that he had made a mistake raising taxes after Buchanan blasted him for it.

Indeed, Bush might have seemed to be bashing himself when he said in South Carolina last week that "life means nothing without fidelity to principles."

Yet these presidential mea culpas have done little to stop the consistent one-third protest vote against him, and they may have the more dangerous effect of pinning Bush in right-wing positions that could haunt him in the general election, when he needs the support of moderates.

As for Buchanan, his failure to win a single primary Tuesday does not bode well for an extended candidacy. Republican Party rules forbid Buchanan's name to be placed into nomination unless he wins at least five contests. It seems unlikely that he will be able to make the kind of major Republican convention splash that he has been hoping for.

Habitat For Humanity Is A Worthy Cause

The Student Government Association Senate heard from two members of an admirable group Monday. The members spoke of their involvement with Habitat for Humanity.

Habitat is an international organization which works to provide decent, cheap housing for low-income families and individuals. It does this through the work of dedicated volunteers and cooperative businesses.

Habitat members actually build houses for these families, and then allow the families to pay for the houses through 20-year, interest-free loans.

The houses are good quality. The crucial design and construction is done by professionals, and the materials used are often donated by construction material companies. Some materials are sold to Habitat at a reduced price.

Habitat for Humanity stands apart from many other organizations in that, instead of talking, or lobbying, or complaining, it does something every day. The hands-on philosophy of this group is just what communities like Wilmington need.

Habitat has a new chapter at UNCW, and it will be involved in construction of a house on the corner of Queen and 8th street this coming Saturday from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m.

The representatives asked SGA members to come out and help with the construction, or to just watch for a few minutes and see what the group is all about. They told the Senate that Chancellor Leutze will be one of those on the site.

If you're looking for something useful to do this weekend, here it is.

The time spent at construction sites like that is extremely useful and beneficial to the community around. Each UNCW student would do well to at least consider the offer. Just go downtown and take a look. Who knows, you might find yourself happy in working to keep a low-income family out of the rain.

Stillpoint With Bob Haywood Let Memories Enrich You

I just returned from my 22nd annual Spring Break Cruise to the Bahamas. My wife and I, along with 16 students and the captain, were on a 65 ft. sailboat for a week-long wellness cruise, mainly in the Berry Islands some 90 miles southeast of Miami.

The weather was incredibly beautiful, nothing but sunshine, fair winds and flat seas. On our way home we had a group meeting in a motel where we looked back on the week and shared memories about swimming near hammerhead sharks, feeling like we were in an aquarium as we swam through a reef, having great conversations, eating couch fritters cooked by the captain and on and on and on.

It was a time out of time where all worries, all questions about the future were put on hold; where time seemed to expand because we suddenly found ourselves able to live in the present moment without having that present contaminated by worries about the future or bad feelings related to our past. There were, to be sure, scary moments when a person was newly at the helm trying to keep the boat on course in the pitch blackness of night or where a shark seemed a little too interested in our activities. A whole host of new experiences filled each day like finding a special seashell or watching the sun rise or seeing a new and brightly colored fish or having a conversation with a brand new friend or watching two incredibly inept crew members trying to paddle the diags and laughing until our sides hurt.

Experience piled upon experience and memory is now piled upon memory.

Everyone needs some outstanding and potent good memories. Memories can enrich lives for years to come for we have the incredible capacity of bringing past experiences into present reality in our minds in a way that is quite impactful. Meditation and reflection on memorable moments have real power to change our moods and regard us in experiences that calmed us, pleased us or inspired us.

It takes a little work to be empowered by memories. It takes more than simply flipping through a photo album and glancing at a snapshot and remembering a moment. It takes looking at the snapshot and installing ourselves once to let that experience float up again into our present where it brings whatever pleasure and strength and laughter and love that was inherent in that moment. I don't know what kind of Spring Break you had, but I hope it left you with some good and powerful memories. They can sustain us through some very busy weeks or dealing with some very troublesome issues.

I come back renewed and fortified. I've only been at work one day and I've already been back to the Bahamas in my mind several times and laughed and felt close to some very special people. I hope you make some good memories too. Bob Haywood is the campus minister and a regular columnist for The Seahawk.

Phillip Loughlin Teaching Our Lessons To The Young

This semester I am student teaching at a rural high school. As a teacher, one of my main responsibilities is to facilitate the learning of my students. The kids are a typical bunch of twelfth graders, mostly concerned with getting their diplomas and getting out of school. Few of them take time to notice things like local and national news. And I'm glad! What would they be learning from the "responsible adults" that run this world?

On a local level for example, what are the kids supposed to learn about getting involved in their communities? Eight students in Brunswick county gathered to protest the poor planning of a highway bypass that has taken three lives (including one of their fellow students) in less than a year. The bypass crosses a main local road, and the intersection is marked by a lone signal light on an otherwise empty stretch of highway. Motorists running at highway speeds, particularly trucks, are often right on the signal before they notice it. Picture an eighteen wheeled truck carrying 20 or 30 tons trying to brake like a Porsche at the last second.

The students' complaint was that the state decided to spend money to construct a new welcome center instead of redesigning the deadly intersection. . . . a logical and righteous argument. They gathered at the grand opening of the new center and picketed. As a result, eight of the students were suspended for skipping school. In fact, they were participating in a more educational experience than any classroom could provide—participating in a lawful assembly to express their displeasure with the government. It's one of the freedoms that many people think made America great. But school administrators, unable to raise their minds above the level of a book of rules, decided that these students needed punishment.

Today's young people are seldom involved in any action that may make a difference in their world. Fear of reprisal often outweighs apathy as a cause of this problem. With so many people raising Cain over so many pointless or stupid issues, the Brunswick county students who stood up for nothing less than their personal safety should be congratulated, not incriminated.

On a national level, what are we teaching young people about personal privacy and human decency? I'm talking here about the uproar concerning Bill Clinton in the presidential race. It has become cliché that a primary tool in any political hopeful's bag is a creative investigator to dig up the dirt on his rivals. What is anyone supposed to think when a campaign comes down, not to how qualified a candidate might be, but what personal disgrace the opposition or some family member has committed in the past? It's not that I particularly care about Bill Clinton's presidential hopes, but is that how today's high school students should see the leaders of our nation—as mudslinging, name-calling, pseudo-intellectual children?

Finally, on a global level, I wonder what kids are supposed to think about a nation in the so-called "free-world" restricting a fourteen year old girl from traveling abroad to abort the unborn child of a rapist. Irish officials have decided that since abortion is illegal in Ireland, then it should not be legal anywhere. Since, of course, it is legal elsewhere, then in their infinite wisdom they will keep this child from going away to have the procedure done. It doesn't seem to matter that, in addition to the stress of pregnancy in a barely mature body, she will have to bear the fruits of that assault for at least nine months and the psychological repercussions of the entire ordeal for the rest of her life.

I think there is a grand lesson to be learned here. I'm just not entirely sure what it is. It sounds to me like the same lesson learned by so many unfortunate young women in back alley abortion clinics. It is the lesson portrayed in the visions of George Orwell and Aldous Huxley of a society in which any non-conformist activity subjects the perpetrator to chastisement, exile, or reprogramming at worst.

That, at least, is the lesson as it likely appears to high school aged students. These are the lessons they will remember when they hear graduation speakers telling them that they have the power to go out to change the world. This is the anti-inspiration that will shuffle them off into an "acceptable" existence, doing what they are expected to do and unwilling to deviate from the norm. Brad Sekulich Croatian Question Isn't Clear Cut

What's going on in Croatia? That's a question I am often asked and an even more often one that I ask. The confusion that surrounds Balkan political issues can very often be detrimental to finding out what exactly is happening in that region of the world. Take, for instance, the assertion that the war in what was Yugoslavia, was a clear-cut case of right versus wrong. Although I still believe this to be more true than false, I think it is imperative for anyone interested in the subject to read an article in the "New York Review of Books", by BBC correspondent Mishla Glennly entitled The massacre of Yugoslavia written Jan. 3, 1992.

Often it is correctly said that there is blood on all sides of Balkan political issues. Glennly makes this blood alarmingly visible. His description of Croatian president Franjo Tudjman's democratically elected government is somewhat less than flattering. He cites Tudjman's flag waving nationalism as a very serious threat to the idea that Croatia is truly a democratic nation.

He also gives details concerning the treatment of ethnic Serbians living in Croatia since the war broke out. This treatment, especially when condoned by the state, is deplorable. He also points out, though, that in many cases the maltreatment of Serbs comes as a result of the frustration of Croats who have spent hours, and even days, in the bomb shelters. Being held prisoner in their own homes by an untouchable enemy, such as a distant artillery battery or a fighter bomber, is often too much to bear and the result is retaliation on the nearest object associated with the enemy.

Glennly, however, does not believe this to be a war for the creation of a "Greater Serbia". Here I believe he is wrong. The defense chief of Yugoslavia, installed since Glennly's article appeared, is Blagoje Adzic, a vehemently anti-Croatian Serb nationalist. And, as I mentioned before, the words for "greater Serbia" appeared on the command post of the Yugo Army in Vukovar the day that that city fell. Many Serbs in Croatia have sworn never to cede one inch of territory back to Croatia. This does not bode well for the prospects of a lasting peace in Croatia.

What about peace in Croatia? Will the U.N. peace keeping force be able to ensure a lasting peace in the region? In light of the fighting in Osijek, heavy by some accounts, this past Sunday and the tank battle in Shivenik I will be surprised if the U.N. has the resolve to make peace a reality in the area. They do not have a plan to settle the question of ownership of houses taken from Croats and given to Serbians. Their other plans seem to be vague and they are not convincing in the role of mediator. It will also be interesting to see how the older people react to the Russian members of the peace keeping force. Weren't these the people Tito told to go to hell in 1948? Well that was a different time.

For now the fighting is not nearly as bad and for that we can all be very thankful. The next few years will be an especially interesting period in Balkan history. Hopefully the killing will stay at the back of the stage and reforms for the problems of the economies, ethnic rights, and general reconstruction will be successfully addressed.

Phil Smith It Was All A Dream....Or Was It?

I had the weirdest dream, last night. It was the wildest thing. You probably won't even believe it, but I guess I'll tell you about it anyway. See, last night I dreamed that we had a SPRING BREAK. And would you believe it lasted a whole week? I know you probably think I'm stretching my imagination, but it was so real to me. There I was, packing up my car with most of my ten or so pieces of clothing, preparing to make the trek up Interstate 40 to my home in Davidson County.

Although it was supposed to be spring break and all of my friends were going off to the Bahamas or the Florida Keys or Shalotte, I was on my way home to work for the entire week to pay off all of my parking tickets.

You do realize that it is almost time for Fall registration and there will undoubtedly be a rush on the cashier's office with thousands of cash-wielding students eager to pay off parking tickets so they can register.

still don't know exactly how I got all of these parking tickets. I just got a letter in my campus mailbox telling me I owed several thousand dollars in "Parking violation fines." At first I was angered because I couldn't remember where or when I got any of those three tickets.

Of course there was that time when I parked in the fifteen minute zone outside of the ticket office and returned fifteen minutes and twelve seconds later, only to find an $800.00 ticket garnishing my windshield.

And then there was that Saturday morning during Christmas vacation when, as the ticket read, "molecules of rubber from the left rear tire are in physical contact with molecules of white paint, indicating blatant and malicious disregard for the law." Thus shall not park in the white lines' clause in the Student Parking Code set forth by the UNCW branch of the U.S. Department of Ridiculous

Parking Codes, Ludicrous Division."

Since this was my first offense of that nature, I thought maybe the head meter-maid would let me go to Care Fear Community College and take a defensive parking course. I later learned that there was a waiting list of about 8,000 (our student population) parking impaired students just for the "Yellow Lines-White Lines, What Do They Mean?" class.

Anyway, this explains why, in my dream, I had to go home and work during spring break.

The dream wasn't all bad though, because I dreamed that on Saturday, February 29, our basketball team beat ECU. They did however, lose in the first round of the CAA tournament. I also dreamed that February 29th was my twentieth birthday and thousands of loyal readers sent me cash-laden birthday cards to commemorate the occasion. (In case you missed my dream, belated cards can be addressed to Phil Smith c/o The Seahawk.

One part of my dream was a nightmare. This was when I dreamed I was watching the UNC-Duke game and UNC lost. (I'm sure glad that was only a dream.) As I was nearing the end of my dream, (Trust me. It's my dream and I knew when it was about to end.) it was time to come back to Wilmington and get ready for school. I had a lot of studying and unpacking to do and before I knew it, Monday morning was here. I was frantic because I had not written my column for The Seahawk and it was getting past my deadline when suddenly a loud shrieking noise pierced my ears and caused me to wake up and jump out of bed to turn off the alarm clock. "Oh, it was all a dream," I said, "or was it?" Until next time, keep your mind out of the gutter and your head out of the toilet.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dear Editor,

On behalf of the UNCW Men's and Women's Swimming and Diving teams, I would like to thank all the students and faculty who came out and supported us during our meet with East Carolina University this past weekend.

I believe our victories were, in part, inspired by you, the fans. Our swimmers and divers were motivated to put forth that little extra effort by the large number of students and faculty who supported us.

This victory was particularly special since it was the first time in the history of our sport that we beat East Carolina University. We were very pleased to be able to do this in front of our own fans and alumni.

Again, thank you all for your support. Dave Allen Swim Coach

Dave Barry No Solution In Brassiere Mystery

In this crucial election year, with the nation's economic future hanging in the balance, it is more vital than ever that you, the American voters, be informed of recent developments concerning the Giant Mystery Zebra Mussel Brassiere.

As you no doubt recall, we recently reported that the New York State Department of Environmental Conservation was trying to determine the ownership of a very large brassiere that had been pulled out of Lake Ontario with a colony of zebra mussels clinging to it. Zebra mussels are a new environmental menace that is spreading around the country at an alarming rate, similar to law-school graduates except that they (the graduates) have no formal code of ethics.

When we last reported on this story, the DEC had the Mystery Brassiere under observation, with no clue as to who the owner was, except that she'd never need a life preserver. If you recall our report appeared, we received a letter from Mr. Bob Isaacs of Tonawanda, N.Y., who claims that "the bra in question probably belongs to my friend Candy." Mr. Isaacs states that in the summer of 1989, he and Candy were in a small motorboat on the Erie Canal and Niagara River, and "to make a long story short, her brassiere found its way into my hand."

By way of supporting (Ha ha!) evidence, Mr. Isaacs enclosed a color photograph that clearly shows him driving a small motorboat while wearing a brassiere the size of two regulation beach umbrellas on his head. As a taxpayer, you have to ask yourself why the U.S. Coast Guard is frittering away its resources guarding the coast when this kind of activity is taking place on our inland waterways.

Anyway, Mr. Isaacs states that eventually the brassiere was lost overboard, and he theorizes that it was carried downstream to Lake Ontario, where the zebra mussels, often referred to by marine biologists as "The Lingerie Perverts of the Deep," got hold of it.

Judging from the fact that his letter was neatly typed, we decided that Mr. Isaacs was a reliable journalism source, and we were willing to consider the Mystery Brassiere case solved. But just then, without warning, we received a flood of letters from alert readers drawing our attention to a new report in The Watertown (N.Y.) Daily Times written by Christopher Taylor, who has been covering this story like shrink wrap, and who should, in our opinion, win a Pulitzer Prize in the prestigious Bivalence-Encrusted Undergarment Reporting category.

The story, headlined "STRIPPED: CLAIMS OWNERSHIP OF ZEBRA MUSSEL BRASSIERE," states that a striptease dancer named "Busty Heart," from Norway, Maine, claims that she recognized the Mystery Brassiere from a newspaper photograph.

"That's my bra," she is quoted as saying. She states that she wore it for an appearance last April at Lou's Cordial Lounge in Rochester, N.Y., where the bra was raffled off. "One man told me that he was going to put it on his boat as a sail and it could have blown off," Miss Heart points out.

We have here a photograph of Miss Heart, and we will note for the record that the brassiere she is wearing, a size triple-M, makes the brassiere on Mr. Isaacs' head look like it belongs to Rainbow Brite.

So we called up Gerard C. LeTendre, who, as the Supervisory Aquatic Biologist at the New York State Department of Environmental Conservation's Cape Vincent Fisheries Research Station, is responsible for keeping an eye on the brassiere. He was aware of Miss Heart's claim, and in fact had seen a photograph of her.

"This is a big brassiere," he said, "but it would be a tight fit, getting her into it."

We told Mr. LeTendre about Mr. Isaacs' letter, and he confirmed that it was biologically possible for Candy's brassiere to have drifted down into Lake Ontario.

"That's just as logical as anything else," he said.

So it looks as though the only way we're going to get to the bottom of this thing, as a nation, is to have the Senate Judiciary Committee hold live televised hearings, featuring probing cross-examinations of the various claimants by Sen. Ted Kennedy, and culminating in a dramatic courtroom-style re-enactment of the motorboat incident wherein the Mystery Brassiere is placed on the head of Sen. Orrin Hatch. Wouldn't that be great, voters?

Of course there could be problems. There is the danger that the mussels, upon exposure to the Washington humidity — which is actually denser than Lake Ontario — would escape from the bra and multiply like crazy, spreading into vital government agencies such as the Bureau of Unintelligible Prose, attaching themselves in overwhelming quantities to filing cabinets and duplicating machines and slower-moving federal employees. The entire government could grind to a halt until the Pentagon could gear up to move in there with Emergency Tactical Field Brassieres. It's a chance we're willing to take.

States Debate Euthanasia

The month of March has little to recommend it.

If a dog allows you to share its home, you spend the entire month getting intimately acquainted with its paws as you try to keep your floors clean. Presidential candidates are much in evidence, migrating back and forth. Basketball announcers are looking in thesauruses for a new way to describe the motion of a ball dropping through a metal rim.

We haven't endured much of March, and it already has grown old.

Unless you are interested in the issue of euthanasia.

March has roared in like a lion with respect to euthanasia. In Iowa, state Sen. Nick Sturgeon advanced a bill that would amend the state's living-will law to permit physician-assisted suicide. In California, a petition drive is in full swing to get an initiative legalizing physician-assisted euthanasia on the November ballot.

These are bad ideas.

Until Iowa and California guarantee that all their citizens have the right to get the health care necessary to extend and improve their lives, neither state has any business discussing physician-assisted killing.

In Minnesota, state Sen. Gene Waldorf introduced legislation that would make involvement in an assisted suicide grounds for loss of license for health-care professionals. In Michigan, District Judge James P. Sheehy was smart enough to listen to a grand jury and order Dr. Jack Kevorkian, who has helped two women commit suicide, to stand trial on two counts of murder.

The actions in Minnesota and Michigan make good sense. Doctors or nurses who intentionally kill their patients should know that they risk loss of their license and prosecution for homicide.

One of the most important developments so far in March occurred in Idaho. Rep. Bill Sali introduced a bill in the Idaho House that would forbid selling to minors any books that advocate suicide or demonstrate how to commit suicide. Why? Because of the increase in such incidents as the one that occurred last month in Lowell, Mass., where two young teen-agers were found dead with copies of Derek Humphry's how-to-commit-suicide book, "Final Exit," nearby.

I hate censorship. It is the least desirable way to effect social policy. But kids should not be able to get their hands on suicide manuals. If it is reasonable to keep magazines with sexually explicit pictures behind the counter, it makes sense to try to control access by minors to books that give explicit directions and even encourage suicide by means of pills, plastic bags or car exhaust.

Enough roaring. In the spirit of the month, a few lamblike words are in order. The most important March event bearing on euthanasia did not take place in a state legislature or a courtroom. It occurred at a news conference in Washington called by Health and Human Services Secretary Louis W. Sullivan.

He announced new government guidelines that urge doctors to swiftly and aggressively provide patients with painkillers after surgery. Sullivan noted that inadequate pain management is a major problem in American medicine. The new guidelines, issued by the Agency for Health Care Policy and Research and endorsed by both the American Medical Association and the American Nurses Association, call for prevention rather than treatment where pain and suffering are concerned.

Pain is the euthanasia movement's best friend. These superb guidelines make it plain that pain does not have to be tolerated in the hospital or nursing home.

"YEAH... RIGHT"

By RaMona Hupp

Spending Lethargic Days With The T.V.

Having had more than my fair share of free time over my productive (yeah... right) spring break (no, I didn't get a tan) I wisely used my languid/lethargic days to catch up on those illustrious forms of mass media sent from "Executive Heaven" to keep the peasants happy, entertained and brain dead.

Some observations:
—I would like to see at least one local news shows spend more time on "NEWS" rather than sports. On second thought, I'd rather not see any local news shows at all.

—There are two different half-hour shows of local news, excuse me, two different half-hour shows of local sports with a few minutes of weather, and oh, yeah, footage of local and surrounding area traffic accidents. (They seem to have that traffic accident coverage down to a science.)

—On the national news front, Peter Jennings was wearing a "pinkie-ring." H-m-m-m-m-m? —And in the category of TV Personalities for a hundred—

Answer: A television game show host who needs a long, major vacation. Who is Alex Trebek? During the course of a week's episodes I counted Old Al make

Reevaluating A God-Like Band To Mere Mortals

By SHANNON DAVIS
Entertainment Writer

I need to ask a question, so prepare yourself for an answer and it may require a little soul-searching.

Was I the only U2 fan who felt their concert in Charlotte (March 3) feeling a bit disappointed?

I realize I probably expected a little too much from them. I admit I anticipated them to put me in a musical heaven for two hours, o.k., maybe this was too high of an expectation to put on mere mortals. I guess what I really expected from the group was some passion in their music. That's what this concert was lacking.

Bono, who has always been a "soapbox singer," usually preaches a little for some cause, like Amnesty International, or talks on some issue that is having a negative influence on our world. He did none of this Tuesday night. He spoke some, but it was "jibber-jabber" as far as I'm concerned.

I think the reason he couldn't sing with any passion was because their new songs, from Achtung Baby, don't have very much substance, except for the song One, which has some meaning behind it. The lyrics are ambiguous enough to be about two people, two races, two countries or even the east and west populations of a new united Berlin, where U2 recorded Achtung Baby.

They sang all of their hits off of Achtung Baby and probably to their astonishment, but unfortunately not to mine, the several mistakes. Can you imagine how many are on the editing floor? Take a break Alex. —My idea of what real hell is like: 24 hour programming of religious channels, where you are forced to watch blue haired, crying, begging, extortioners of guilt—lest not forget the lavish sets and gaudy wardrobe. A bet Satan gets quite a chuckle.

After too many hours of "Zoo-TV," I turned to the other media dictatorship—radio. Let me first say that I'm terribly prejudiced when it comes to the radio stations in this town—I hate them all (barring WLOZ, which I don't have legally or illegally hooked up to my stereo.)

I had been contemplating requesting a class on what seems to be today's major poetry movement—musical lyrics, but after listening to today's current hits I think I'll just keep my mouth shut.

...A-a-h-h, a-a-h-h, bound for Mu Mu Land... What is that? "They're justified and they're ancient..." I don't get it and have a sneaking (and sickening) suspicion it's because I'm getting old. N-a-a-h-h, couldn't be. Yeah...right!

crowd was unresponsive. So finally, after the obvious request from the audience, they sang their powerful heart-warming songs from their prior albums, like, Pride, With Or Without You, I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For, etc. Those songs brought out a response larger than live from the 25,000 fans in the Charlotte Coliseum.

They did a five song encore and performed for the crowd for almost two hours.

My personal disappointment was not only their lack of passion but also Bono's attire. He cut off his beautiful long locks and seems to be balding a bit on the top. I could have accepted his absence of hair if he hadn't tried to make up for it by dressing in indecent clothing. He started off in black leather pants and a black jacket. Then he changed to a shimmering burgundy blazer and then to a black blazer. That wasn't too bad, but when they came back for a highly demanded encore, Bono had on a shiny, silver blazer. And at the same time they reentered the stage, two mirror disco balls were lowered from the ceiling between the four cars that were already pointlessly hanging in the air.

Where was the simplicity they are known and famed for? I guess simplicity is no longer their spice of life since they're on Zoo TV.

In all honesty, it was still a good concert. U2 has been around for 14 years, maybe they are just striving for a different spice.

Grand Canyon Offers A View Not To Be Missed

By D. NEAL LEEPER
Entertainment Writer

Somewhere in history a man named Murphy made up a plethora of laws governing the happenings of the universe. This law, "If something wrong can go wrong, it will," (or something like that) applies to the first thirty minutes of the feature GRAND CANYON.

A prominent businessman, played by Kevin Kline (FISH CALLED WANDA), wanders off the mainstream roads of Los Angeles and suddenly finds himself lost in a very rough part of town. Kline tries to direct his new 1992 Lexus back to the freeway only to be delayed by the car dying. After pulling over, Kline uses his car phone to call road service for assistance. Murphy's law then continues by the magical loss of power to the car phone. Kline then leaves his car and makes the call at the local corner store.

While waiting for help, a car full of thugs (with big guns) attempts to rob Kline. Just in time to save the day, Simon, played by Danny Glover (LETHAL WEAPON), arrives and loads the car on the tow truck. After an interesting conversation and sequence of events, the two leave for the repair shop. From that point on, Kline and Glover begin a lifelong friendship.

The next day, Kline's wife, played by Mary McDonnell (DANCES WITH WOLVES), begins her mid-life crisis. Luckily, Murphy's Law persists, and during a nice jog in Palm Springs, she discovers an abandoned baby in the bushes. With her son growing up and leaving, she decides that another child is her future key to happiness. Meanwhile, at the office, it is introduced that Kline is having an affair with his secretary. Seems fitting, doesn't it?

Reevaluating Night-time TV

By HAL BOEDEKER
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

The state of "prime time":
Going, going, gone!

Witness:
—In tough economic times, with audiences shrinking, the networks are going the discount route in many time slots with reality shows that are much cheaper to produce than an "L.A. Law" or a "Cosby Show."

—Speaking of which, many long-running entertainment shows like "Cosby" are going off the air soon or, even worse, plummeting in quality at slalom speed.

—And, the most helpless new feeling of all for programmers: No matter the fare, lifestyles are changing. Suddenly, many viewers are tuning out to ... go to bed earlier than ever.

What's a network to do?
Well, how about this: Look to other parts of the TV day for inspiration. Early morning, Saturday morning, late afternoon or late night.

It's astonishing that the networks, those lumbering behemoths, have been so slow to look at themselves and adapt their late-night successes to prime time. Why did it take upstart Fox to depart from the traditional prime-time variety show format with the bold and satirical "In Living Color," after NBC had a long-running success with the similarly styled "Saturday Night Live?"

Rather than fail with '60s-style variety shows starring Carol Burnett or country singers, why doesn't a savvy programmer let Dave Letterman or some other comic move the genre into prime time and into the '90s?

Prime time offers some excellent series, programs as diverse as "60 Minutes," "Murphy Brown," "Northern Exposure," "Seinfeld," "The Simpsons" and "Law & Order." Network TV has much to recommend it these days. But there is no denying that big patches of uninspired shows clog the schedule, especially on Fridays and Saturdays.

Here's a prescription to get TV well. But first, a diagnosis:

1. Why isn't there more quality TV?

The TV audience got savvy long ago—savvier than network programmers seem to realize—in part because of more audacious late-night shows and the far more adventurous fare on cable.

Still, the networks keep stumbling along, trying to transform tired family sitcoms and bland but expensive dramas into the increasingly rare megahit. Too often, their greater concern appears to be to avoid offending viewers and advertisers.

2. Why do the schedules look so similar, night after night?
Prime time these days consists mainly of sitcoms, dramas, newsmagazines and reality-based shows. The schedule is dictated by economics.

Because half-hour sitcoms play more easily in syndicated reruns, we were swamped with 48 of 'em in the fall. Sitcoms cost the networks roughly $500,000 per episode. There are expensive, long-running exceptions. Because of their veteran casts of high-paid stars, "Cheers" costs about $2.85 million per episode, according to the showbiz trade bible Variety, and "The Cosby Show," which ends its run this spring, goes for $2 million per week.

Hourlong dramas run about $1 million per episode, but networks can program newsmagazines for roughly half that amount. The four networks have 22 one-hour dramas ("L.A. Law," "Northern Exposure," etc.), and 12 hours of reality and news—everything from "20/20" to "Unsolved Mysteries" to "America's Funniest Home Videos." At CBS, for instance, "Jake and the Fatman" costs $1.1 million a week while "48 Hours" goes for $500,000. The top-rated show in all of TV, "60 Minutes," runs $600,000 per episode.

Because news-reality shows are so economical for the networks, CBS has that genre to expand. CBS has extended "Street Stories" through the summer, and NBC will debut "Dateline NBC," co-animated by Jane Pauley and Steve Martin's character is introduced during a scene involving a shoot-out. Martin, who plays a well-to-do, high-powered, multi-millionaire movie writer has a run-in with a street person over a Rolex watch.

Martin, after parking his 1992 Ferrari and activating its alarm, is approached by a street person bearing a rather large gun. He demands Martin's Rolex, but instead receives the keys to the Ferrari. Bad move on Martin's part. The gunman gets upset and finally shoots Martin in order to get his watch.

We suddenly switch to Glover's neighborhood, where he is having troubles of his own with a deteriorating neighborhood and a son involved in gang violence and street crime.

What else could go wrong with this situation? A lot. Add an earthquake and a "FATAL ATTRACTION" type secretary and you are halfway there.

When I walked in the theater, I had no idea what to expect. In my first review of the semester, I commented on my liking of Steve Martin. After seeing this movie, my concept of him as an actor increased, and my respect for Danny Glover rose as well. In my opinion, Glover's performance should get him an Academy Award nomination.

This film dealt with the problems that everyone faces in today's society. It touches on the fact that many of us accept what happens in the world without question. Like BOYZ N THE HOOD and DO THE RIGHT THING, this movie stirs up emotions and questions.

On the official "Neal Scale," GRAND CANYON receives an 8 for "damn good, but fifteen minutes too long." Trust me, you will not be disappointed with this movie.

"20/20" alum Stone Phillips, at the end of the month. ABC News is developing a new show to battle "60 Minutes" on Sunday nights in the fall.

The upshot: Prime time is looking more like true-life misery than inspired or escapist entertainment.

3. Why are so many viewers going to bed?

That's an easy one: They're tired. No matter what the networks offer, come 10 p.m., the aging baby boomer audience just wants to roll over.

This trend can be seen in late night. For the 1988 season, "Nightline" pulled a 5.4 rating; so far this season, it has a 4.7. (Each rating point represents 921,000 homes with televisions.)

"Late Night With David Letterman" has gone from a 3.7 rating in 1988 to a 2.8 this season. Even retiring national institution Johnny Carson has lost ground: from a 6.3 for 1988 to 5.0 this season. (By comparison, "Saturday Night Live" remains a stable late-night draw, earning an 8.3 rating this season and in 1988.)

This early-to-bed trend—call it the Ben Franklin Syndrome—has even greater implications for what we might see in prime time. Two San Francisco stations, KPX and KRON, shifted their prime time forward an hour, to 7 to 10 p.m., in February.

So how to improve prime time? Look to late night. You'll remember that in the beginning, "Saturday Night Live" called its ensemble the Not Ready for Prime Time Players. Now, they're ready.

Late-night staples like "Nightline" and Letterman have been baby-boomer favorites ever since a whole generation got booked in college. But many of us aging yups won't—or can't—stay up to see them today. Neither do we have time for later viewing, so we hesitate to tape.

After 40 years, we need something fresher than the networks' obsession with past prime time formulas. And we certainly don't need all those stinking sitcoms.

People In The News...

Macaulay Culkin only looks like a kid. He does meetings like a regular Hollywood pro, in keeping with his big-for-his-age clout at the box office. Producer Joel Silver is negotiating with the "Home Alone" and "My Girl" star for the title role in a movie version of the "Richie Rich" comic books, Premiere magazine reports. When the Culkin clan met with Silver about a year ago to discuss the project at the Polo Lounge in Beverly Hills, little big Mac kicked things off with a handy visual aid. "You want me to be this," the star said, pointing to the words "Richie Rich" among a stack of comic books. "We want this," Mac said, pointing to the title of one comic book, "Big Bucks."

QUOTE-UNQUOTE

— "To me, a star is a large glowing ball of gas, so ... don't want to be that!" — Robin Williams, interviewed on "Stars & Stardom," a special to air Sunday on CNBC.

— "I'll walk into a premiere and think, 'Oh, God, there's the paparazzi. I'll just turn invisible.'"

Then I walk on through. And I see these pictures of me looking absolutely vacant, completely vacuous, because I've disappeared." — actress Daryl Hannah, non-invisible co-star of "Memoirs of an Invisible Man," on her disappearing act, in People magazine.

— "Unlike the show, the majority of cars are not Porsches and Corvettes. There are lots of BMWs and Jeeps." — Beverly Hills high school student Sara Mayers, on the difference between her school and the hit TV version as seen on "Beverly Hills 90210," quoted in Newsweek.

— "Basically I eat anything Elvis would eat." — comedian-actor Bobcat Goldthwait, on staying in shape, in Details magazine.

— "I don't believe in an afterlife, although I'm bringing along a change of underwear." — Woody Allen, quoted in "The Celebrity Almanac."

DEVITO SAYS HIS 'HOFFA' MOVIE IS ABOUT A HERO

What's that saying? Never judge a man until you have walked a mile in his cement shoes? Danny DeVito says directing the upcoming movie "Hoffa" has changed his perspective of Teamsters boss Jimmy Hoffa. "When I grew up, I was under the impression that Hoffa was some kind of hood," DeVito said. But researching his subject for the film, DeVito decided that Hoffa "has done more for the labor movement and put more bread on the table than any man alive. Yes, he is a hero to me." Hoffa, who allegedly had ties (and a complete fashion ensemble) to organized crime, became a missing person in 1975 and is presumed dead. Jack Nicholson has the starring role.

PRIVATE PENN IS ONE PROUD PAPA, WRIGHT SAYS

Being with Sean Penn has taught Robin Wright a thing or two about fame and all that goes with it. Take Penn's endless slugging with the paparazzi when he was married to Madonna or the rest of the actor-director's brooding bad-boy image.

"It makes me wary of the press," the actress tells Movieline magazine. "You just feel like crossing your arms and saying, 'I don't owe you anything.' We're all human, so there are certain days when you're moody or you look and feel like (bleep) — you know, you're in your human state. And suddenly you're approached by people who yell and scream at you. On the back end, you think, 'I can't be this way to my fans.' Then you think, 'I can't? Why not? I'm just like they are.' You have one bad day and, whoops, there goes your reputation. That's who you become. You have a bad period in your life, an angry period, and you never get to live it down."

These days, as the unwed parents of an 11-month-old daughter, Dylan Frances, life isn't about living things down, it's about living. And Penn is living it up in the role of Daddy. "He's a rarity as a father. He's so there. He responds to (parenthood) more than anything in life," Wright says. "It's amazing, really. I always knew he was that way, though. He was that way with his dogs."

Health Nicoderm Helps Smokers Just Say No

BY MARILYN KALFUS
Orange County Register

"Hey, can I bum a ... patch?" Users of the Nicoderm patch might not be mooching the prescription drugs like cigarettes, but they're having a hard time hunting down refills.

Demand for the skin patch, which helps people quit smoking, has vastly outstripped the supply, say doctors, patients, drugstores and Marion Merrell Dow, which markets Nicoderm.

"The demand for our product has been unprecedented," said Tom Heapes, Marion Merrell Dow spokesman. "We had projected that for 1992, we would sell $80 million worth of Nicoderm, and we have sold almost that much already."

In especially tight supply: Nicoderm's 21 milligram patch, the one used in the first few weeks.

"We have increased our

"The worst thing would be to start smoking" production to seven days a week, 24 hours a day," Heapes said.

He didn't know when the company would be up to speed.

The Nicoderm patch is out there, doctors say. But you gotta shop around.

"A few patients have said they went to one or two pharmacies and after the pharmacies did not have them, they called around and then found them," said Dr. Mark Rosen of Los Alamitos, Calif.

He added, "The pharmacies are probably making a note of how much they're selling, and then they'll just order it by the ton."

The makers of Habitrol and ProStep, two other nicotine patches, said they haven't experienced any real shortages, although a spokesman for Ciba-Geigy Corp., which markets Habitrol, said the demand is higher than was expected.

Heapes said Nicoderm shortages have occurred in New Jersey and Boston. A spokeswoman for Pay Less Drug Stores said that chain has had trouble supplying stores with Nicoderm in 10 states.

"They're trying to be as fair as possible," said Sherrie Cooper, a pharmaceutical buyer for Pay Less, referring to Marion Merrell Dow's distribution system. The company has been shipping all the various drugstore chains small increments, she said. "This way, everybody suffers a little bit."

Rosen, who has prescribed transdermal patches for about 50 patients, said he knew of none that went back to smoking because they couldn't fill their prescription.

Dr. Stephen Brunton of Long Beach (Calif.) Memorial Medical Center suggested that people who run out of patches and can't get a refill should chew nicotine gum while they wait.

"Absolutely not," he said. "The worst thing would be to start smoking. They've already started to make some psychological and social adjustments. If nothing else is available, they should use some of the behavioral skills they've learned."

Even if they've just gone through three or four days without a cigarette, he added, "They're well on their way to quitting smoking."

BY DIANA KUNDE
Dallas Morning News

Remember the 1982 film, "The Year of Living Dangerously"? The '90s may well go down in history as the decade of living dangerously, at least in the American workplace.

As one major corporation after another announces personnel cuts, even those holding jobs feel insecure. Experts who work with the unemployed are finding themselves counseling the employed as well.

"I don't think there's a professional in America who can't afford 30 minutes a week thinking about contributing to his or her own career," says Martin Yate. It's part of "keeping both eyes open in the '90s."

Yate, who has written several popular job-search books, suggests some precautionary measures for that 30 minutes a week:

— Try some "safety networking." Make a list of all the people you would call if you were let go. Call them now, when you don't need anything, just to keep in touch. "Too many of us get too busy and let valuable ties slip," Yate says.

— You know the old saying, "It's not what you know, it's who you know." That's not quite right. It's not who you know, but who you get to know and keep in touch with.

— Be an active member of at least one professional association. As an illustration, Yate looked in the "Encyclopedia of Associations" (available in any library reference section) and found 70 examples of retailing associations, 30 of which were national. "You get a directory with names, telephone numbers and job titles of all the members. That's someone to network with should the need arise."

— If you're in immediate danger of being let go, you may want to start clipping the classified ads in newspapers, newsletters and trade journals. "The worst thing that could happen is come Hanukkah or Christmas you have a drawerful of old newspapers and a job. The best thing: You have a record of companies that have been active in the last 12 months."

— At the office, "This is a period of time to look around the department for all the jobs that aren't being done by anybody, the corporate vacuum ... If you do it intelligently, you can find yourself with a great power base."

Some corporations are so intent on sending the message that employees need to be responsible for their own careers, they are paying consultants to train existing employees in career management.

China Miner Gorman, senior vice president for the outplacement firm Drake Beam Morin Inc., has been supervising some of that training.

"There's been a fundamental shift in the American business culture that says corporations are not the entity with primary control over individual careers. They don't want it, and they're not exercising it," Gorman said.

To gain more control over your own career, she suggests these strategies:

— Develop strong communications skills — both listening and talking. This means "understanding and being able to translate what corporate goals are, and being able to talk to management." Both Gorman and Yate stress the importance of actively soliciting feedback.

— Learn how to assess your skills and be able to compare those with the skills the organization is going to need in five years. Leverage any available training to acquire the skills you will need — not just in your company, but in your industry or field.

Gorman suggests individuals picture themselves as a corporation. "Everybody's going to have to be their own purchasing agent, their own training director ... You have to operate your own R&D department, asking yourself, 'What skills am I going to need for this product to be more competitive?'"

Your career may be affected by events you can't control, but if you take the time to build alternatives, you'll be better positioned for change, Gorman argues.

"Folks who incorporate these kinds of behavior into their professional lives don't always get what they want, but I'm convinced they get more."

Yate's books include "Knock 'em Dead with Great Answers to Tough Interview Questions" and "Keeping the Best: And Other Thoughts on Building a Super-Competitive Workforce," both published by Bob Adams Inc.

SGA Update

Special Election Edition Thursday, March 12, 1992

In an effort to enlighten the students on who is running for what offices and some of their views, the SGA Update will give you an inside look at the candidates. The statements following each candidate are their own answers to questions from a survey they filled out at the time of their registration.

President

Lee Person Sophomore Senator, President Pro-Tempore

I am seeking the position of Student Body President. I was not sure that I was ready for quite so huge a commitment until the most reliable sources urged me to run. My friends and esteemed colleagues on the Senate thought I was ready to lead the Student Government Association forward to better represent the students, and I feel honored that they would have so much faith in me. I am proud to run for this position to serve the student of UNCW, to make our college careers more exciting and memorable.

I think the student body and SGA have benefited from my services. I pride myself on giving 100% at all times, and I have given no less to the students of UNCW. I feel my organizational skills and leadership abilities have and will serve the students of this University well.

Joe Mitchell, Student Service Coordinator

I am seeking the position of SGA President because I feel that I have the ability to lead the SGA, establish and implement worthwhile programs and make sure that the students are being heard with their concerns. This past year I have been the catalyst for getting things done in SGA, and as President would continue with the same amount of dedication and belief in the fact that the students can accomplish anything provided we work together.

SGA can greatly benefit from my membership. This past year, I have been a catalyst in getting programs and projects done for the student body. I established a Legal Services Program, established the SGA Consignment Bookstore, and worked with the Environmental Concerns Organization to fund Campus Recycling. Prior to my term of office, sport clubs had to pay 20% of their profit on event paraphernalia to Athletics. However, after meeting with Athletics and working to resolve this with Mel Gibson, an employee of this department, sports clubs do not have to pay this 20%. I established the Student Grievance Board, which looks at student concerns and works to do something about them. It is also our job to develop student services. In addition to the ones previously mentioned, we reformed the organization Council of Organization Leaders, and have begun the development of a Little Seahawk Program, which is a type of Big Buddy program for the incoming freshmen. Currently, we are working to establish a program called Be a Faculty/Staff Member for a Day, where you can go with a faculty or staff member and see what job they do. We have also worked with the Post Office and plans are that by the beginning of Fall Semester, students will be able to send personal messages to other students working to the Post office without postage. Also I have developed student discount cards for UNCW's students, which went out in the beginning of this past Fall semester. There are many other things that have been accomplished also, but what I want the student to know is that I am dedicated and will get the job done. I believe in delegating and working closely with others in a productive manner.

Curtis Wilson, President of SGA

I am seeking the position of SGA President because I believe I can continue the work I started in my first year. I want to help bring SGA and the student body to a higher level of awareness and activity.

This is the end of my eighth consecutive year of SGA. I have learned many tricks of the trade from SGA and other leadership positions. I have spent one year as president giving to others what I have learned and now I want to continue my services.

Vice President

Vern Granger

I am running for the position of SGA Vice-President. The position of Vice President requires a person to run on important groups such as the senate. In the past year and a half, I have acquired this ability through the various organizations that I've worked on not to mention the things I've done at my high school and community.

Jeff Gurkin

I am seeking the Student Body Vice President position because I would like to do my best to help the Student Body. Being Vice President, I can help run the meetings more effectively and can address more student issues. I would also like to get more people involved in Student Government.

Ziggy Nix

I am seeking the position of Student Body Vice-President because I want to help the students. I am active in a number of organizations on campus which gives me a lot of contact with people and their problems. I enjoy working with people and helping them.

Sean Williams

I am seeking the office of Vice President. I am seeking this office, first and foremost, because I feel I am the best candidate for the position. I have served in the Student Government Association (SGA) senate for the past two years. I understand how the Senate works and I also understand how the Senate should work in order to pass down legislation that is in the best interests of the student body. Over the past two years I have seen too many issues on which the students have not received a fair representational vote, because of confusion on the senate floor. A good Vice President should run the meetings in a clear, concise, and orderly fashion. I know I can do that.

Polling Places:

University Center		Wagoner Hall
10am - 5pm	(Mar. 18)	11:30am - 1:30pm 4:30pm - 6:30pm
10am - 2pm	(Mar. 19)	11:30am - 1:30pm

The following are candidate responses to these questions respectively.

1. Why are you seeking this position?
2. In your opinion, what purpose or role should the Student Government Association serve?

STUDENT SERVICES COORDINATOR

Ivy Chalmers

"I feel this is the best position for me to be in to reach all the students. I feel this is the most student oriented committee in SGA.

"Student Government is here to enhance the students experience at UNCW.

Rob Oliver

"I believe in working for the students in establishing projects and services that they feel are necessary to improve student life and the University as a whole.

"The purpose of the Student Government Association is to listen to concerns, develop projects and services, and to appropriately allocate student fees to benefit each and every student on this campus.

SENIOR VICE-PRESIDENT

Jennifer LePage

"The purpose of SGA is to serve the students in an effort to enhance student organizations, student life and the image of students.

Vanessa Nye

"Next year will be my last year and I would like to get the chance to work with my class- the seniors on a more personal level and hopefully help everyone benefit in their last year at UNCW!

"The student government should serve many roles that should all be very productive and positive. We should serve the students, faculty and community to the best of our ability.

SENIOR SENATOR

Holly R. Price

"I want to represent the senior class.

"SGA represents the student body as a whole. They represent its best interests and lead the campus to make good decisions.

JUNIOR CLASS VICE PRESIDENT

Brandi Goertmiller

"I find SGA involvement to be exciting and stimulating. You come in contact with the pulse of the university as well as people who are informed and care. I like being an active and effective part of that experience.

"We need to represent the students by maintaining and proposing policies and changes that will further benefit the university community. We need to make sure that students are aware of us that we are capable of causing changes and that we want to hear them.

JUNIOR CLASS SENATOR

Mike DeBlasi

"I feel the position is not overextending myself nor is it a position beneath my abilities. The position is one in which I will be able to voice mine and the students' opinions and be able to be truly listened to.

"The purpose of SGA is an active role in the integration of the student body and the surrounding community.

SOPHOMORE CLASS VICE PRESIDENT

Krista Habecker

"I am ready to get more involved and help more. I believe running for Vice President will give me those opportunities.

"SGA is an association that's main goal should be to serve the students here at UNCW. Would, in any way, affect the student body. Those programs funded or run by SGA should also benefit the student body.

SOPHOMORE CLASS SENATOR

Tony Henry

"I feel that I am a qualified African American male to represent my sophomore colleagues.

"I think the purpose that the student government should serve is to be the voice of the students on campus.

Stanley Jones

"To get involved with important issues on campus.

"Serve as the voice of all students, but knowing all the limitations and other rules.

Kilee Lange

"I would like to be involved in SGA to make the UNCW student life all the better. I feel I can pose a positive image so Student Government and UNCW in general.

"To provide opportunities for UNCW students to grow from and expand their horizons, to support UNCW organizations and make sure students, faculty and staff are happy.

Melissa Pagan

"I want to be more involved with the student body. I want to be in the position to help students by supporting them through the best yet most difficult times of their lives.

"The Student Government Association's purpose is to serve the student body. SGA is there to protect a student's rights and when students feel they are being discriminated or taken advantage of, SGA is there to help them and get something done.

Tonya Whitehead

"I feel this position would be a good starting point for further SGA involvement.

"The student government should serve two fundamental purposes: to serve as a liaison between the students and the administration and to appropriate funding to various student organizations.

Tourney Full of Memories

"A...A...c-h-o-o!"

Ugh! You'll have to excuse me this week. I gotta cold while covering this year's Colonial Athletic Association Tournament in Richmond, Virginia.

The kicker was the weather outside which was 70 degrees. Of course, that was when the sun was out, which was never. I have the soggy socks and shoes to prove it. However, I caught the sniffles inside the stadium, which was as warm as a Leona Hensley's chain hotel at the South Pole.

You see, a week earlier there was ice where the basketball floor was. Under pressure from the league, the coliseum people took out the ice. What they failed to remove or cut off was the cold air fans under the floor which froze my feet more than once.

"A...A...blamhem! Sorry."

Speaking of frozen, judging from the Seahawks' performance Saturday, one might have thought the ice was still on the floor. UNCW, rattled by Old Dominion's pressure defense, turned the ball 26 times and shot just 45 percent from the field; hitting just 37 percent of their shots in the first half.

At times, the Seahawks' feet looked nailed to the floor. Their feet kept coming out from under them as players scrambled back on defense. It was not a pretty sight. The first half simply was a mess and the second, wasn't much better.

"Sniff, Sniff! Excuse mey."

The only positive thing about the game was the play by senior Matt Fish, who again was a terror inside, scoring 26 points on 12-16 shots from the field. The Washington, Iowa native also had seven rebounds, three steals, two monster dunks, and one block. Senior Kenneth Aldrich also had a solid game scoring 19 points and grabbing 10 rebounds, although most of his points came at the end with the outcome already decided.

Fish meanwhile might want to brush up on his Japanese. Scouts from Toshiba, a professional ball club from Toshiba, Japan were impressed by the 6-10 center's performance and figure to offer the UNCW senior a professional contract after graduation.

Fish, however, has not made a decision yet where he will play ball next season.

The senior has said several times this season that he is interested in playing overseas. Fish toured last summer with a team of CAA All-Stars in Great Britain. The senior averaged six points and four rebounds in the team's six wins over English squads. He, however saw limited action.

"Cough, Cough!"

Speaking of limited action, the Seahawks have now lost for the third straight year in the opening round of the tournament. Before that, UNCW had been in the Championship game two out of the last three years, losing both contests, a 53-50 defeat to Navy in 1986, and a 78-72 overtime loss to George Mason in 1988. The Seahawks hold a 6-7 record overall in tournament play, losing in the first round three times, the semifinals twice, and the title game also twice.

The good news is the squad is only losing four players from this year's team, Fish, Aldrich, Mark Eaton, and Bryan Withers. Unfortunately the four players accounted for 50 percent of UNCW's scoring this season. The most missed will be Fish and Eaton. Fish averaged 17.3 points and 9.5 rebounds per game, while Eaton led the Seahawks fast breaks averaging 10.4 points a game and dishing out a team high, 78 assists this season.

"A...A...c-h-o-o!!!"

Despite the key losses, UNCW will be an improved team next season. Tim Shaw (10.5 pts) and freshman John Spann will anchor the forward positions. Junior Keith Adkins (10.3 pts), fourth in the league in three-point shooting, will return along with junior Reggie Vency and sophomore Drew Phillips.

The center position meanwhile will be a highly contested area with freshman Greg Cave and sophomore Sherif El-Sanadilly sharing the duties. But not be surprised if incoming freshman, Darren Moore, a top 150 high school basketball pick, breaks into the starting line-up come next November.

Finally, despite my cold I always seem to bring back memories from each tournament.

The '89 tourney in Hampton, Virginia brings back images of seeing Elvis in Beaumont. The 1990 tournament taught me that there is no such thing as a left turn in Richmond, which explains why it took me and then-sports editor Chris Wright an hour and half to get to our hotel.

I have crazy memories of bars, hospitality rooms, and singing show tunes at 3 a.m. at the 1991 tourney. This year I will fondly recall monsoon weather (i.e. lots of rain), the James Madison party room, the mysterious absence of the Seahawks mascot (probably flew south for the winter), and A...A...c-h-o-o!

Ah, yes. A cold.

Monarches Win A CAA Crown

BY PATRICK FOWLER
Sports Editor

Old Dominion is king of the Colonial. The Monarches, led by 6-7 senior Ricardo Leonard's 18 points and 10 rebounds, captured the Colonial Athletic Association Tournament title with a 78-73 win over James Madison Monday night.

A first-year CAA member with a first-year coach Oliver Purnell, the Monarches (15-14) seeded fourth in the tourney dethroning both the number one and two seeds, Richmond and James Madison, in route to the title. ODU defeated UNCW in the first round.

The loss for JMU was the second for the Dukes, who have made it to the title game two out of the last three years. The defeat also came after head coach Lefty Driesell picked up his 600 coaching win the day before in a semifinal win over American University.

ODU took control early scoring 12 of the first 16 points in the final. They beat the Dukes on the offensive board building a 12 point cushion, 41-29 late in the first half.

The Monarches maintained their double digit advantage most of the second period, but a 13-4 JMU run trimmed the lead to foul twice in the final two minutes. JMU Bryan Edwards (26 pts.) cut the margin to three with a three-pointer with 10.7 remaining, but two clutch free-throws by junior Keith Jackson (19 pts) with 8.3 sealed the win for ODU.

UNCW's fate was decided two days earlier in a 77-67 loss to the Monarches Saturday afternoon.

The Seahawks (13-15) bothered by ODU's pressing defense turned the ball over 26 times, a tournament record, and shot just 45 percent from the floor, hitting only 37 percent in the first half.

"For every one of our players on the floor," UNCW coach Kevin Eastman said, "they had

The Seahawks started strong running to a 6-0 lead, but ODU rattled back with 10-6 and 9-4 runs late in the period to stake a nine point halftime advantage, 33-24.

ODU's lead was trimmed to three, on a lay-up by Kenneth Aldrich, but the Seahawks drew no closer. The Monarches kept a double digit from the 12 minute mark on. UNCW did get a big outing from senior center Matt Fish, who scored 26 points and grabbed seven rebounds.

Forward Kenneth Aldrich was the only other Seahawk player to score in double figures. The senior scored 19 points and snared 10 rebounds.

ODU is making its first NCAA appearance since 1986.

Lady Seahawks in CAA Tournament

UNCW Faces ECU

BY JIM CLARK
Assistant Sports Editor

"Anything can happen."

Those were the words of both head coach Sherri Tynes and leading scorer Lorraine Cordaway when asked about today's game against rival East Carolina University in the first round of the Colonial Athletic Association Tournament in Norfolk, Va.

"There's a lot of bad blood between us," Cordaway said. "We're fired up about playing them first."

On paper ECU shouldn't have any trouble with the Lady Seahawks. ECU won both games comfortably—88-73 here, and 89-66 at Minges Coliseum—but neither game reflects the intensity of play, and the games aren't played on paper.

In the first game, ECU maintained a single-digit lead through the first 35 minutes before pulling away. Forward Pat Martin led the Lady Seahawks in both scoring and rebounds, with 18 points and 11 boards.

The second contest saw ECU jump out to an early double-digit lead and cruise. UNCW played them even in the second half, but couldn't cut into the lead. Forward Zandra Harris led the team with 20 points and center Hannah Grady pulled down a team high 11 rebounds.

UNCW is coming off a strong performance against non-conference foe UNC-Greensboro. The Lady Seahawks lost a tough battle 65-62 at Greensboro. Despite the loss, UNCW showed

"There's a lot of bad blood between us. We're fired up about playing them first."

Lorraine Cordaway

throughout. Neither team was able to build a lead of more than seven. Two free throws by Kymm Eliot gave the Spartans a three point lead with two seconds to play.

UNCW inbounded the ball to Kim Bush at mid-court and her shot caromed off the front of the rim as the buzzer sounded.

Cordaway led the Lady Seahawks with 17 points and Harris pulled down ten boards.

Thursday's first round action has UNCW and ECU, the eighth and one seeds, playing at 2 p.m. At 4 p.m., fourth seed James Madison University takes on fifth seed George Mason University. At six, the second seed Richmond Spiders will battle the seventh seed William and Mary. In the evening's finale, third seed Old Dominion University takes on the fourth seeded Eagles of the American University.

The Lady Seahawks are ready to take on the Lady Pirates because they know this could be their last game of the year. When asked if beating ECU would make the season a little easier to look back on, Cordaway smiled and said, "Definitely."

Tynes echoed the confidence exhibited by her leader. "Our philosophy all year has been 'Never Die. Never Quit.' We're not throwing in the towel yet."

Seahawk Kevin Hooker takes a mighty swing at a Liberty pitch Tuesday afternoon. UNCW (6-0) beat Liberty on Chris Mc Bride's two out solo home run in the bottom of the ninth. UNCW plays UNC-Charlotte today at 3 p.m. at Brooks Field.

Sports Briefs. . . Blair Named M.V.P.

Curtis Blair, senior guard for the Richmond Spiders, was named for the Colonial Athletic Association's Player-of-the-Year for the second straight year.

The 6-3 standout was second in the league this season in scoring with a 20.5 scoring average, reaching double figures in all but one of the Spiders' 28 contest.

Blair ranks sixth on the Richmond all-time scoring list with 1,576.

Kent Culenko, a 6-2 freshman at James Madison, was named the league Rookie-of-the-Year. Culenko, ranked ninth in the league in scoring with 13.7 points, and led the conference in three-point shooting with 72 treys.

Lefty Driesell, head coach of JMU, was selected Coach-of-the-Year. Despite losing nine players to graduation, two being all-conference performers, the Dukes finished the regular season tied for first place in the conference (12-2) and an overall mark of 19-9.

Swimmers End Year

The UNCW men's and women's swim team finished fourth and sixth in the CAA Swimming and Diving Championships, Feb. 26-29, at Greenville, N.C.

James Madison (753.5) won the men's title, followed by American (557) and East Carolina (515.5). American (801.5) took the women's top spot, followed by JMU (759), and Richmond (462).

Seahawk Burak Erdem broke a CAA record and qualified for the NCAA's meet in the 200 backstroke with a time of 1:49.56. The UNCW men's team finished 8-3 for the year. The women's squad posted a 9-2 mark.

Track Record Set

Four UNCW athletes set school records Saturday in the Last Chance Track and Field Invitational at East Tennessee State University in Johnson City, Tenn.

New records were set by: James Jacobs (46 feet, 4 inches in 35-pound weight throw), Jim Niddifer (52.9 seconds in men's 400-meter dash), Steve Benefield (22.9 in men's 200) and Sam Bobbitt (8:25.4 in the men's 3000).

UNCW hosts 30 teams in the Seahawk Invitational Saturday.

Tennis Teams Win

The UNCW men's tennis team defeated Charleston Southern, 5-1, in Charleston, S.C. on Saturday.

The Seahawks' loss came at the number one singles position when German Jose Alvarez was defeated. The double portion of the match was not played.

The women's team defeated Mount St. Mary on Feb. 22 and face Campbell at home Tuesday.

Young People Survey Reveals Attitudes On Race

BY GEORGE E. CURRY
Chicago Tribune

NEW YORK — Young Americans born after the civil rights milestones of the mid-1960s are more likely than their parents to interact with members of another race, yet half describe race relations as "generally bad," a study released Tuesday suggests.

A poll of 1,170 people conducted by Peter Hart Research Associates for People for the American Way, a national civil liberties group based in Washington, was described as the most detailed study of racial attitudes of U.S. youth.

The subjects of the study, ages 15-24, have no firsthand memory of Martin Luther King Jr., the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the 1965 Voting Rights Act or the 1965 Selma-to-Montgomery march. As members of the post-civil rights era, they were more likely than their parents to have attended desegregated schools and to have socialized with members of a different race.

But when asked, "Do you think race relations in the United States are generally good or generally bad?" 50 percent of those interviewed described relations as bad, compared to 42 percent who said they were good.

Blacks were more pessimistic than whites or Hispanics: 57 percent of African Americans surveyed thought race relations were bad, compared to 48 percent of whites and 49 percent of Hispanics.

Of all the young people polled, 71 percent reported having at least one "close personal friendship" with a member of a different race.

"The finding that so many youth have friendships with people of other races was very encouraging," said Arthur Kropp, president of People for the American Way. "But it also pointed to an alarming conclusion: For whatever reason, many young people evidently regard their friends of other races as exceptions to the rule."

"Rather than generalizing from their own one-on-one experiences, they accept stereotypes or generalize from less intimate experiences. The result is that these young people cling to stereotypes, all the while maintaining personal friendships that fly in the face of those stereotypes."

Fears about crime fueled many negative generalizations about African Americans, the study found. For example, 56 percent of young whites interviewed agreed strongly or somewhat with the comment that "white people would not be safe going into most black neighborhoods."

Researchers said that conclusion was reached without taking into account a neighborhood's character or income level.

The report also found: "In an era of belt-tightening and increased economic pressures, America's young people have been thrown on the defensive, guarding their own personal interest in getting a good education and competing for jobs." Consequently, white youth expressed less support for affirmative action programs than their African-American or Hispanic counterparts.

Of young whites surveyed, 51 percent oppose colleges giving "special consideration to minority students," and 65 percent oppose "special consideration to minority job applicants."

The report noted: "The findings also demonstrate the corrosive effect of 'hot button' rhetoric in sharpening racial divisions on these issues. For example, if the term 'special preference' — a phrase politicized by the Bush administration and others — is substituted for the term 'special consideration,' white opposition shot upward, to 64 percent regarding education efforts and 78 percent regarding employment."

Moreover, the study found a gaping perception gap between whites and minorities: A plurality of white youths (49 percent) surveyed believe it is whites who are denied opportunity, while most of the minority youths (68 percent of blacks and 52 percent of Hispanics) believe it is they who are discriminated against.

Placed within a larger context, the attitudes of youth parallel those of their elders, the report noted.

"Centuries of social struggle brought our nation to the threshold of legal equality for all citizens by the 1960s," the report said. "Since then, the moral consensus moving the nation forward has stalled, and the public dialogue on issues of race and ethnicity has fractured into a cacophony of competing voices."

The report observed that "a growing number of elected officials are exploiting racial divisions for their own political gain. The cost of this moral breakdown is rising racial tensions across America — on our campuses, in our schools, our city streets, our neighborhoods and our workplaces."

But the report also found reason for encouragement. "Unlike their elders, whose attitudes have hardened, young people are teachable on the subject of race relations," it said. Furthermore, 55 percent of the young people interviewed said race relations were "getting better."

An other reason for optimism, the study said, was that although young blacks and whites differ on some key issues, they share a consensus on core values, such as family, the need for personal responsibility and fairness for all.

American youths' views on race

Results are from a survey of 1,170 15-24-year-olds nationwide. Here are responses to some of the questions or statements in the study; figures are in percent of those surveyed

"Do you think race relations in the U.S. are generally good or generally bad?"

Race	Generally good	Generally bad	Mixed feelings or not sure
Whites	44%	48%	8%
Blacks	35	57	8
Hispanics	46	49	5

"Racial and ethnic minorities still face a lot of discrimination in our society."

Race	Agree either strongly or somewhat	Disagree either strongly or somewhat	Not sure
Whites	81%	18%	1%
Blacks	82	17	1
Hispanics	82	16	2

"It's okay to have a country where the races are basically separate from one another, as long as they all have opportunities."

Race	Agree either strongly or somewhat	Disagree either strongly or somewhat	Not sure
Whites	42%	56%	2%
Blacks	35	63	1
Hispanics	36	65	2

300 New Spaces Trustees Consider $20 Increase In Parking Fees

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

The Board of Trustees will consider a $20 price hike on parking stickers for next year. The Business Affairs committee has brought the motion to the board.

The increase is to pay for debts on two new parking lots. One of the new lots is being built this summer. The new lot will be to accommodate residents of the on campus-students so that the parking lots located in front of Wagoner Hall can be used for commuter students.

The added funds will add up to be about "7000 times $20," said R.O. Walton, vice chancellor of business affairs. Towana Moore, coordinator of Auxiliary Services, said, "It depends on the number of details sold."

The price increase, which will bring the cost of parking permits up to $80 "can't be postponed. We have to do this to pay off the debts on the lot," said Walton. Scott said that it is not possible to reduce or reconsider the raise. "It coincides with money that is needed."

"We are in a bind with parking. We borrowed money to finish parking planned for students," said Dick Scott, vice chancellor of Business. The new lot is "to free up lots S and T in front of Wagoner Hall for commuters. Students have had a hard time and this is to create more parking."

"In order to build the lot, we had to borrow or acquire the money," said Scott.

Lots are still being paid off and the increase is " earmarked to pay for the new lot," Scott said. Moore said that the money will be used to paying the loans and "lighting, pedestrian lanes, turning lanes, the salaries of all the people that work in the Parking office and some of the campus police."

Walton said that he is unsure of what effects the proposed raise will have on the students. Walton said that if enough students decide not to get a permit, it will cost those who do. "This raise will set the price for the next three to four years. If enough students do not get permits, the price will have to be increased to cover the costs."

UNCW is one of the schools with the lowest prices for parking permits and each student is guaranteed a place. "A parking permit at UNC-Chapel Hill costs around $240 and a space is not guaranteed," Walton said.

Moore said that she does not think the increase will effect the students much. "It is cheaper to park here for one day than it is at the beach or downtown. It's about 22 cents with the increase to park here all through the week and 30 cents a day on weekdays. It looks like a big increase but it really isn't."

Scott said that the increase will still be paying for the new lot for years to come. "It will take several hundred thousand dollars to pay off the loan. It's on 10 year payback. We retire debts over a long time."

Student Body President Curtis Wilson informed the Student Government Association senate of the increase Monday night during a report and he received a negative reaction from the senate. "We are going to hear the judgment and possibly take action from there."

Westside Opens Health And Wellness Moves

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

Student Health and Wellness, the Student Development Center and LivWell moved into the newly-renovated Westside Hall over Spring Break and began serving students in their new location last Monday.

Dr. Kathleen Jewell of Health and Wellness said they doubled in sized from their previous location at Burney Student Support Center. "It was too small. There was no privacy. We had to do things in the hall. There were no phones. There were two bathrooms that the staff, students and those giving specimens had to use. There were no windows. There was no break rooms; the nurses had nowhere to sit down. It was a difficult place to work."

"There was no privacy. This is a better location for confidentiality because we're not in the hall."

There were no new services added but Jewell said that there are more rooms. Some of the new rooms available are trauma, health education and allergy rooms. Check-in now has a room. "We have 11 rooms in total. We gained four."

There is also space for a pharmacy in the new location. "Getting that is up to the university. We have given them the information," Jewell said.

She would like to see the pharmacy rent crutches and sell Ace bandages as well as fill prescriptions for the students. Jewell said that the pharmacy is "important. It would be less expensive for the students and it would be a way for the school to make money. We couldn't get a fee increase and we need to generate revenue."

The new space will allow Health and Wellness to see more students. Jewell said that she is glad Health and Wellness got the space when they did. "Now we can get a sense of the business in the space. We can work it out now as opposed to summer. Also, it is very expensive to leave space vacant when the space is needed."

CATCH A BRAVES GAME LIVE IN ATLANTA

The Student Activities Office is organizing a trip to Atlanta to watch the Braves battle it out with the Houston Astros on Saturday April 25.

An $85.00 fee will include transportation, a one night stay at the Quality Inn, breakfast, and a ticket to the game. The bus will leave UNCW at 9:00 am on Saturday 25 and return by 8:00 pm on Sunday 26.

For more information contact the Student Activities Office at 395-3827 or stop by University Union 202.

FIVE WILMINGTON WOMEN

An exhibition of workers by Ann Conner, Elizabeth Darow, Georgeann Haas, Virginia Wright-Frierson, and Margie Worthington will be featured March 1 through April 10 in the University Union. This exhibit will include prints, collages, and paintings from the five local artists and will be on display in the Living Room, Study Lounge and Lobby area. A "Meet the Artists" Reception will be held on Wednesday, March 25 from 4:30-6:00 pm in the University Union Living Room. This event is sponsored by Arts in Action and the University Union.

ART DISPLAY

Sibyl O'Thearling, will display her series entitled The Goddess in Ink February 29 through April 27 in the University Center Lobby. Sibyl's artwork is figurative expressionistic realism which concentrates on social commentary. Sibyl paints human figures with an emphasis on line and uses arbitrary color to create emotion. Her series will be accompanied by the poetry of Jean Jones. A "Meet the Artists" reception will be held on April 1 in the University Union Lobby from 4:00-5:30 pm. This event is sponsored by Arts in Action and the University Union. Don't miss it!

SAILING

Sailing, Sailing! Imagine the wind in your hair and the sun on your face as you stand at the helm and steer the boat out to sea! Try it - it won't cost you anything but your time. Our next sailing trip will be this Friday afternoon, March 20, at 1:00 pm. Come by Alternatives! (University Union - Room 104) 395-3683 to sign up!

UNCW HOSTS ULTIMATE FRISBEE TOURNAMENT

The UNCW Men's and Women's Ultimate Frisbee Teams will host the Collegiate Eastern Ultimate Frisbee Tournament to be held March 21-22 on the UNCW recreation fields.

The tournament will feature more than 30 top collegiate teams from throughout the east coast. UNCW's teams are coming off of successful tournament performances at the prestigious Stanford Invitational held at Stanford University in Palo Alto, CA, where the women's club finished first overall, and men's team finished a close second losing to Stanford by only 1 point.

The Collegiate Eastern tournament at UNCW will be an important tune-up for both teams as they approach the National Championship tournament to be held May 22-24 in Fort Collins, CO.

SENIOR LEADERSHIP

Nominations are now open for the Senior Leadership Award. This award is open to all UNCW seniors graduating between May and December 92 with a cumulative grade point average of at least 3.0. The student who receives the Senior Leadership Award will be selected based on the following criteria: a demonstrated ethical, creative, flexible, and motivational leadership style, involvement in campus life and in community service, and academic success.

The award includes a cash stipend of $400 provided by the UNCW Alumni Association and a personal plaque provided by the Leadership Center. In addition, the winner's name goes on a plaque that is displayed in the Leadership Center.

Applications are available in the Leadership Center. The application and two letters of recommendation must be returned to the Leadership Center located in room 212 of the University Union by March 30. For more information, call the Leadership Center at 395-3877.

REMINDER FROM THE CASHIER'S OFFICE

All outstanding debts owed must be cleared before pre-registration - March 30 - April 13. Students with debts will have a "hold" and will not be allowed to register. Debts should be paid at the Cashier's Office, James Hall.

COOL

(Council of Organization Leaders) is really starting to get off the ground and that means decisions must be made and projects started on. The first order of business is that we must complete elections. We are now accepting nominations for President, Vice-President, Secretary, and Treasurer. The floor will be open until the next general meeting on Wednesday, March 25 at 7:30 in the study lounge of the University Union. Anyone interested in one of these positions call Wendy Ahrens in Student Activities, the Leadership Center or Student Government. We are also seeking committee members for the various programs that COOL will be offering. As you can see, it is very important that you become involved in COOL and not have your organization left out.

'HANG WITH THE FACULTY

The Student Government Association is implementing a new service called "Be A Faculty Member For A Day." This program allows students to spend a day with a faculty or staff member of their choice, and see what types of things they do on a "typical day" and what the faculty member's job entails.

This service can be a fun and learning experience for both faculty and students. Many times students are interested in pursuing a career in a certain field of university life such as athletics, student affairs, academic affairs, or business affairs, or just want to know what faculty here at UNCW do. Through this program students will now be able to explore these careers, and make general discoveries about the employees of UNCW.

The Student Government Office has a master list of all participating faculty and staff along with the dates that the faculty is available. All a student has to do is drop by SGA, sign up and meet the faculty member in their respective office on the morning of the day they signed up for.

Also, if the student gives the office assistant in SGA a copy of his or her schedule for the given day, an attendance voucher will be sent to each professor. The SGA office will be responsible for contacting the university employee and giving them the student's name.

DEMOCRATS

The UNCW Young Democrats will be meeting with the New Hanover County Young Democrats Sunday, March 15 at Paddy's Hollow in the Cotton Exchange downtown at 6:30 p.m. Call Alex (452-2177) or Denny (343-9827) for more information.

Business Week Underway

BY JENNIFER WILSON
Staff Writer

The Cameron School of Business Administration has been presenting its eleventh annual business week, "Preparing for Tomorrow Today," since Monday.

Dr. William Hall, chairman of the Business Week '92 planning committee, said that Business Week began as a two day affair where, "we brought business leaders and public officials into the classrooms to talk to potential employees." It now lasts a whole week and has other activities offered.

Students, faculty and staff members take this opportunity to discuss current business issues with local leaders. "It provides the means to show how material learned in the classroom can be applied to everyday business practices," Hall said.

Monday, Career Day was held in Cameron Hall. This gave students the chance to learn about potential employment opportunities, career preparations and trends in Southeastern North Carolina. Companies in attendance included Wachovia Bank and "Preparing For Tomorrow Today" is this year's theme.

Trust, K-mart Fashions, Jefferson-Pilot Insurance Company, DuPont and Corning Glass.

Jim Braye, of Career Planning and Placement, said Career Day was different from a typical job fair because the emphasis was not on hiring but the exchange of business information.

The Commerce Cup Challenge, UNCW's answer to a college bowl, also began on Monday. This two day challenge gave student teams the chance to show their knowledge of business. The Institution of Management Accountants student chapter won this competition.

Wednesday and today were set aside for business leaders to speak about issues pertaining to their businesses. The Cameron School of Business Administration has dismissed classes for these two days so students and faculty can take advantage of the talks being given in the areas of accounting, economics, finance, management, marketing and production concerns.

Wednesday night, Dr. Bertram Wolfe of General Electric Nuclear Industry gave a keynote address on the subject of "Job Satisfaction, Nuclear Power and the Welfare of Mankind." Geoffrey T. McGrath, scheduled to speak tonight, cancelled his speech due to scheduling conflicts.

Representatives will be on hand from 9:30 a.m. to 3 p.m. to speak on manufacturing, sales, health care and marketing. The local government administration and public hospitals will also have representatives giving presentations. All UNCW students and members of the public are encouraged to attend on a space available basis.

Business Week will end tomorrow with the traditional student/faculty softball game. The Sigma Alpha Beta fraternity will challenge the business faculty at the UNCW Athletic Field 3, at 3 p.m.

Nordan Visits Campus

UNCW's writer-in-residence, fiction writer Lewis Nordan, will be on campus today and Friday to read from his novels and give a writing workshop.

Nordan is the author of Magic of the Swamp, The All-Girl Football Team, and Welcome to the Arrow-Catcher Fair.

Nordan will read from his work in Bryan Auditorium in Morton Hall tonight at 8:00 p.m. He will be in the Faculty Lounge in Morton Hall Friday from 11:00 a.m. to 1 p.m. to meet informally with readers, writers, and the community.

On Friday from 2:00 p.m. to 4:00 p.m. he will conduct a workshop on writing in Morton Hall, room 102.

All the events are free.

Nordan's visit was postponed from last week because he was stranded in Pennsylvania due to bad weather, an announcement from the English department said. The events are sponsored by the UNCW Professional & Creative Writing Program and the North Carolina Arts Council.

Sandy Fries, who has written for some of television's most popular shows, will give a talk about the making of "Star Trek: The Next Generation" at 7:30 p.m. on Wednesday, March 25 in the University Center Ballroom. The talk will be illustrated with film clips.

Television shows that Fries has written for include "Fame," "Quantum Leap," "The Smurfs" and "Tom and Jerry."

Fries has received an Emmy nomination for his work.

The public is invited to attend the presentation.

Emerge II looks at cheating

BY JENNIFER WILSON
Staff Writer

The academic honor code of UNCW students is under investigation.

Emerge II, a group of about 10 sophomores at UNCW, is concerned with the amount of cheating and stealing that occurs on campus, said Cathy Birmingham, assistant director of the university union for leadership development. Birmingham explained that the Emerge II members are investigating the honor code because they want all UNCW students to be proud of their alma mater. "They don't want to graduate from a school that has problems with cheating," she said.

Last year seven cases of cheating and four cases of plagiarism were reported to deans within the college's schools. During the fall semester, four students were caught cheating and all four cases were resolved between the faculty member and student. The Emerge II members, most of whom were involved with the Leadership Center program Emerge I as freshmen, are putting their learned leadership skills to use. They hope to raise the awareness of the honor code of all students at UNCW.

The honor code, which defines cheating, plagiarism, bribery and the procedures followed by faculty members or students who report such activities, is written in a way that the Emerge II members say students don't want to take time to read.

The members plan to rewrite the UNCW honor code and put it in readable brochures which will be distributed to incoming freshmen at orientation. They would also like to hold open forums on campus and, according to member Ruby Brown, "the distribution of a student survey has been discussed."

Brock Snyder, programs coordinator for the Leadership Center, said that the Emerge II group sent a survey to the faculty to determine how faculty members present the honor code in class and how they deal with cheating students. The two-page questionnaire received, "a huge return rate and the results are being inputted to the computer now," he said. "We won't know the results for a while."

The Environment Coral Reefs Are In Danger

BY DAN KEATING
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

KEY WEST, Fla. — Rising along straight paths of shining white sand, sculpted canyon walls of living coral frame the underwater world at Looe Key.

Fat-lipped frowning groupers peer out of the coral holes. Shimmering gold and blue queen angelfish travel in pairs. But nearby, van-sized banks of star coral waste away like moth-eaten blankets — a sign that the reef is dying.

The underwater scene is a grim one. And a University of Georgia researcher's suggestion late last year that parts of the reef were dying as quickly as 10 percent a year startled the world.

The call to action has led to an ugly collision, this one between scientists and environmentalists, between research and politics.

Scientists say they want time to be sure. Environmentalists say proof may come too late. The scientific uncertainty, though not unique, can be paralyzing. It forms the foundation of animosity between researchers and activists on many pressing subjects, such as AIDS treatment, global warming and silicone breast implants.

Begin with what we know:
The coral reef is dying.
Of course.
The president's dying, too.
You're dying.

I'm dying.
Everything that's alive is dying.
Living is dying.

To see that reefs die naturally, just look at the existing Florida Keys. They are the old reef that died 125,000 years ago when sea level changed. The new reef grew as a replacement.

The problem is that estimates of the timetable for the demise of the present reef range from a decade to an eon.

The real questions are: Is the reef dying naturally in spots? Will it be rejuvenated in others?

Is the death of the reef today different? Is there something terribly wrong? Is the reef dying quickly? Is man to blame?

The 220-mile line of coral off the Keys is the only barrier reef on the continent. The prospect of its disappearance is distressing enough to bring dozens of scientists and politicians into Key West this week to hatch solutions to the problem.

The Coral Reef Coalition, which holds its inaugural conference Thursday through Sunday, is patterned after the successful Everglades Coalition that brought together scientists and policy-makers to convince the world that radical changes were needed to save the River of Grass.

The reef coalition plans to press the same argument for the reef and call for drastic measures to save it.

But although bold headlines have been made out of a few small studies on the reef's demise, the world has ignored the scientists' full story. We just don't know.

James Porter, the Georgia researcher whose widely publicized study raised cries that the reef could be doomed within a decade, is calling for more study, not action.

"All I can say right now is, in all honesty, I don't know," he said. "This is a situation of people trying to see patterns. I don't want to take remedial actions until we know if there's a problem. We need more time. It's not time to launch a regulatory program."

"With the Florida Keys reef tract, people are so eager to treat the environment well, they're identifying causes before the overall pattern has even been demonstrated."

"I want to stay out of the politics of the ecology," he said.

The restrained course of Porter and the other scientists pains Craig and DeeVon Quirolo, the Key West couple who founded Reef Relief. A high-profile organization that was even named a presidential point of light by George Bush, the group has pressed to keep the reef in the forefront. But Reef Relief's founders say the scientists are stopping short.

"Scientists hate to be put out on a limb," DeeVon Quirolo said. "Their position shouldn't be the gauge of responsible government action and public policy."

SGA Has No Place In The World Of Art

One aspect of network television news which is notable and sometimes disturbing is its sense of humor about the workings of government. News analysts like David Brinkley chuckle as they report the idiosyncrasy of some government policies and decisions. Who among us hasn't heard the stories about the defense department paying $500 for whatever ugly amount it was for a toilet seat? How about the $10 thousand government study to determine what color of tuxedo is most popular in the United States? Get ready for a shock: it was black.

We laugh at these ridiculous realities as though we have been tickled too long. We find humor, but at the same time feel a bit of pain. After all, our tax dollars fund these blunders.

If you're not familiar with this feeling, now's your chance to get an eyeful of it. Just take a stroll up to the second floor of the University Union and stick your head in the door of the Student Government office. Just remember one thing as you look: you are perfectly healthy. The spots you see are not optical hallucinations; they are real indicators of the ingenuity and talent for interior design possessed by members of SGA.

Yes, SGA has taken student fee money and put it to some tangible use this time. They've painted the office walls a nice, non-descript color named "kabuki" which might not be so bad if left alone. But they didn't leave it alone. They got out the sponges.

The SGA painting committee (we haven't been able to track down the actual names; it could prove more difficult than naming check-bouncing Congressmen) took household sponges, dipped them in varying colors of paint, and then — as Dave Barry would say, We are not making this up — dotted the walls with ink blots, many of which are literally dripping with color.

The overall effect makes the office resemble nothing so much as a day care center or kindergarten classroom, which many would consider to be ironically fitting.

It is fair to say that President Curtis Wilson is the main instigator in this fiasco. He was heard to say in a recent SGA meeting that if others didn't join him in the project, he would complete it himself. Maybe the power of the presidency has been too much for his higher mental faculties. But he isn't completely crazy, because...

The retina-confusing pattern ends at his door. That's right. Wilson supported this idea from the beginning, but, suspiciously, left his office walls in their unobtrusive solid tint.

Of course, we as students could be appalled by the price tag of this disaster. But to do that would be to lose an opportunity to laugh. Believe The Seahawk, SGA will do plenty in the future to get mad about.

Let's all just sit back and enjoy the humor of this one.

Stillpoint with Bob Haywood Pick Out Your Course in Life

I still find myself thinking about sailing during Spring Break in the Bahamas. Part of our trip involved sailing all night four different nights in order to get to places where we wanted to spend our days. To accomplish this meant setting up watches for 1 1/2 hours each with two crew members. When it came our time to be at the wheel, we would come up from below and ask the person at the wheel, "What's our heading?" and they might respond, "270°." Then we would take the wheel and, guided only by the numbers on the compass card which were lit by a soft, red light, we would try to keep the boat on course.

Of course, keeping the boat strictly on course wasn't possible due to the action of the waves. Sometimes the bow would stray off to starboard and other times port. But even with those moves, we always found ourselves at the appointed island in the morning. Even the most inexperienced person at the helm seemed to be able to average out errors so that we remained, basically, on course.

The course was a given. To get from Great Stirrup Island to Bimini we sailed twelve hours at 270° which was due west. There were no signs. If you were lucky you could pick out a star and keep your eye on that. But the course illuminated by that little red light remained constant. We had to stay on that line to get where we wanted to be.

I wondered how many of us are clear about the compass headings of our life. It's an incredibly important question to ask. "Where am I heading?" Some folks know they want to sail around the world, that is, their life-long goals are clearly in view and they're able to set about making plans, gathering provisions and charting their course to accomplish their dream. Many of us are simply island hopping. We don't have a long term goal but are moving toward that with some in between kind of stages. On our cruise we knew that the first leg of the journey was to get to Bimini where we could clear customs. For many of you the first leg of the journey is getting into school and choosing a major. And once you complete that leg of the trip, then the options for the next leg of your journey begin to emerge and the choices begin to offer themselves.

Whether you are traveling around the world or simply sailing from island to island, each decision demands that you chart your course and determine your compass heading. You can't get there by accident or by not deciding. Getting where we want to go or even where we think we want to go demands setting sail, letting go of some present and moving out of whatever harbor that serves as our present anchorage into unknown seas.

But if we have, at least, a heading, a direction, the next step we want to achieve, we do have the comfort and the security of knowing that we are on course.

On which course is your compass presently set? Bob Haywood is UNCW's campus minister and a regular columnist with The Seahawk.

Phillip Loughlin

Goin' To Thee Dollhouse With Phil

My friend's wife went out of town last weekend, and he, finding himself bachelor for a couple of days, invited me to go with him down to Myrtle Beach. He was a little less than specific about where we would go, but I have always been a little bit adventurous (or stupid). I agreed to join him.

He picked me up on Saturday afternoon and we were off. We were both in high spirits, and the beautiful sunny day made us both feel a mild touch of spring fever. In my mind, thoughts of high times in high school days cavorted and cartwheeled. As we crossed the river bridge on highway 17, I almost felt like a teenager again.

I'm not real sure what was going on in my friend's mind. He had this wicked grin that made me turn away my eyes. If I ever travelled down to Hell with Satan, I'm sure his look of eager anticipation at the thought of another soul collected would be nothing next to the leer on my friend's face. He said very little at first. His silence was punctuated by short, giggling sounds. I began to have mild concerns about my choice of companion for the evening.

I decided to toss in a sure-fire conversation sparkler. "What do you think about the democratic race for president?" I asked him.

"Mmmmm. Hee hee hee hee," he replied.

Not a good sign. . . . Then he seemed to come back to reality (or at least his own personal version). "Oh, sorry man. I was thinking about something better than politics. I think the Democrats have shot themselves in their collective foot again. They'll have the voters so divided and so ticked off that the vote will be completely mixed up. Clinton will get the nomination, but he'll lose the election to Bush."

"Wait," I interjected. "Back up to that thing about 'better than politics.' That doesn't sound like you at all. Are you okay?"

"Just wait," he told me mysteriously. "You'll see what I like better than politics." At that, he giggled again and resumed his grinning silence.

As the miles of woods and swampland sailed by outside, I was able only to get single word comments out of him. What in the world was he so wired about? As we crossed the state line and passed the first fireworks store, I began to worry about what I was getting into. That free-spirited sense of well-being I had felt earlier was beginning to give way to a feeling of foreboding.

We rolled through North Myrtle Beach, darting through traffic like a pinball on speed. My friend's giggling had turned into a higher pitched cackle. Sweat stood out on his brow, and his knuckles shone white on the steering wheel. The grin took on a look of urgency as we neared the city limits of Myrtle Beach. I buckled my seat belt then, something I usually disdain. We sailed through traffic like Harry Gant at the start of a Winston Cup race.

My friend's cackling turned into all out maniacal laughter and we swerved across three lanes and whipped into a driveway. I peeked up from under the dashboard to see where we were. The sign on the building in front of us proclaimed The Afterluch, but in the front door hung a huge sign stating "Closed until spring." My friend seemed not the least bit put off by this turn of events, as he began to comb his hair and straighten his shirt. He stepped out of the car and, after second, third, and on to tenth thoughts, I decided to join him.

Right next door to The Afterluch was an adjoining club. . . . The Dollhouse. Two huge guys were working the door and valets were parking cars. A limo and several very expensive cars were parked in the VIP spaces in front of the place. What in the world were we doing at a ritzy place like this? My friend walked to the door which he belonged here or something. In fact, one of the doorman spoke to him familiarly as he entered.

As I stepped inside the door, it all became clear to me where we were. This was one of the "Dollhouses" Motley Crue sang about. Through the cigarette smoke, waitresses in "merry widows" and bustiers carried trays of drinks. My eyes, perhaps unlightened in the ways of feminist political correctness, locked onto the backside of a waitress like laser tracking missiles from an F-15. I followed her steps until my heat sensors went really wild. One of the Playboy centerfolds had come to life and was stalking across the floor in nothing but a G-string and high heels. Another was gyrating her way out of a see-through bra on top of a table. This was definitely better than politics!

I must have followed my friend to a seat by the main stage by sheer empathy. I know I never looked at him to see where he was going. My overloaded optics ranged around the bar like the revolving disco lights overhead. Gorgeous women with almost no clothing on just mingled through the crowd. Others, in various stages of disrobing, strutted on the stage or frolicked on tabletops. Everywhere, men sat or stood, mostly with enraptured looks and alcohol glazed eyes. Some held up dollar bills which the dancers allowed them to slip under a garter. I quickly began to dig through my pockets.

Someone touched me on the shoulder and I turned to stare straight down the cleavage of a goddess. . . . And she spoke to me! I tried to answer in mute futility, and she smiled at my ineptness. She spoke again, but the sensory overload caused by blasting dance music, flashing lights, the reek of cigarettes and some unidentifiable perfume, and of course the beautiful semi-naked women drowned her voice in my head. She finally pointed to the beers on her tray and I realized she was trying to take my bar order. I pointed to a light beer and my friend did the same.

As the waitress walked away to get our beers, my friend placed a pile of dollar bills on the edge of the stage in front of us. A dancer stalked her way over to us and began to wriggle her lithe body. She stuck a finger in her mouth, then lightly traced it along places that I had dreamed of touching only moments before. She then spun around and bent over double, smiling back at us between her long, long legs. My friend picked up one of the dollars and folded it before slipping it into her already stuffed garter. She smiled and blew him a kiss, then danced away to collect more dollar bills.

As dollar bills, the night, and many beers passed by, I loosened up somewhat. While my friend was off wasting good beer, one of the dancers who we had tipped especially well sidled over and spoke to me. She told me that for five dollars I could have a table dance. That sounded fine to me. The song began and she stripped for me. I certainly enjoyed the sight, but I felt weirdly guilty making this girl dance naked for me. Didn't she feel cheapened? I began to talk to her as she undulated. I asked her how long she had been dancing and she told me. I then had to ask her how she felt about all these guys staring at her body. Her answer surprised me.

"I really like it," she said. "I know it sounds sick, but I've always been an exhibitionist at heart. I once took a dare to go into a 7-11 naked and buy a case of beer. I got the beer free."

"Is this all you do for a living?" I asked her. "I mean, it looks like the money is good, but do you have a day job?"

Again, I was a little shocked at her answer. "I'm a registered nurse," she told me. "Back home, I work nights at a local hospital. When I moved here, I found that my certification was no good, so I had to renew it. I'm doing this until I finish my classes."

"Oh," she added as the song ended and she took her five dollars. "The money is good."

As she walked away, I thought of Byron's poem, "She Walks in Beauty." It was still staring at her receding figure when my friend came back. "Man, the line in that bathroom is incredible," he gripped. "So, what did I miss?"

I said nothing, but answered with a cackle and a demonic grin. I folded a one and held it up to the dancer on stage.

Dave Barry Get Ready... It's Tax Time Again

April 15 is almost here, and as a public service we have once again assembled a distinguished panel of leading consumer financial advisers from around the nation to answer your common tax questions. Unfortunately they once again got into the gin at the hotel hospitality suite and were arrested in the lobby fountain wearing only a thin film of avocado dip. So once again we are going to answer your common tax questions ourselves.

But first we have word of an important new initiative by the Internal Revenue Service (official motto: "See Schedule 936850345-D For Official Motto"). We found out about this from a newsletter sent out by Donald Mitgang, director of the Buffalo, N.Y., IRS district. A copy was mailed to us by alert reader and Certified Public Accountant Suzanne Pfister, to whom we say: Thanks, and be prepared to spend the rest of your life undergoing tax audits so thorough that you will be required to produce your individual toilet paper clippings from as far back as 1967.

According to Director Mitgang's newsletter, the IRS initiative is called "Compliance 2000."

"To put it in a nutshell," he states, "it is a new philosophical approach toward compliance. We hope it will result in a more compliant taxpayer."

We love the sound of that — result in a more compliant taxpayer. It sounds as though they're developing a new strain of goat.

Director Mitgang explains that the goal of the Compliance 2000 initiative is "to determine why taxpayers are not complying and what we need to do to make them compliant."

Whoa! THERE'S a real mystery! Why aren't taxpayers complying with the tax code? Hmmm. . . . We have been wracking our brain, trying to think of a possible cause, and we are wondering if — this is going to sound farfetched — maybe it has something to do with the fact that the tax code is larger than the average taxpayer's home and nobody in the entire world really understands it because it was apparently written by hostile mutant non-English-speaking lawyers from space, plus it is revised about every 25 minutes, plus it is used to take taxpayers' money away and turn it over to a federal government that routinely spends it on activities like declaring National Deviled Ham Awareness Month.

Nah, that couldn't be it. It's probably some kind of chemical disorder in the taxpayers' brains. Anyway, until the IRS is able to develop an improved taxpayer, possibly through a combination of genetic engineering and electric fences, you should try to be as compliant as possible. You can start by studying the answers to these:

COMMON TAXPAYER QUESTIONS
Q. If I use the standard 1040 tax form, how do I indicate my preference regarding the Elvis stamp?

A. You simply write "THIN ELVIS" or "FAT ELVIS" in the box labeled "Spouse's Social Security Number."

Q. What is a good amount to obtain that I gave to charity?

A. Many taxpayers have obtained excellent results with "$2,379.52."

Q. I am a joint taxpayer filing singly with three dependents living separately but calling all the time. In 1991 my gross exclusionary non-reimbursed net taxable income was $26,365.47, with an adjusted excess itemized disqualifying redemption of $3,109.23, but I don't have any questions because I mailed in my tax return on Jan. 3 and I already got my refund nyah nyah nyah.

A. We hope you develop a kidney stone the size of Richard Simmons.

Q. In reviewing my tax records for 1991, I find that they consist of a cardboard box filled with cash-register receipts that are impossible to read because apparently nobody in the United States has ever replaced a cash-register ribbon. So now I'm trying to do my taxes and it's 1:30 a.m. and I have IRS forms all over the kitchen table snarling at me and demanding to know things like do I have any capital gain distributions not reported on line 13, and all I have to refresh my memory is 500 little pieces of curled-up paper, each of which has maybe four ink molecules on it and the only financial information I can obtain from them, using a powerful magnifying glass, is "HAVE A NICE DAY." My question is: Is the commission of Internal Revenue still named "Fred?"

A. Yes, and Fred has a nice letter in the Form 1040 instruction booklet in which he states that the IRS is "testing" exciting new approaches by letting certain taxpayers file by telephone and by doing the mail for taxpayers who ask for our help."

Q. I'm going to call him right now.

A. Good idea! Don't mention our name.

Susan Trausch Clinton Not Man For Democrats' Ticket

Do the Democrats have a death wish? I can't believe these people. They must have strategy sessions to figure out how they can alienate the electorate. Either that or they've been infiltrated by Republicans.

First they shove Bill Clinton down our throats. Now they're telling us he's got "an electability problem," and that Paul Tsongas and Jerry Brown make three.

Last week, in a Boston Globe story headlined "A party in fear of a flawed nominee," Walter Robinson gave us the wisdom from the Democratic oracles, who must have been doing a Rip Van Winkle since 1988. On Super Tuesday they woke up, looked around, and said, "Golly, we're gonna have some kind of dud on our ticket."

So, whose fault is that? Where were you people when Tsongas was the only Democrat with the guts to say he was running against George (Desert Storm) Bush? More to the point, where were you when Clinton was warning his way to the top?

I love the quote from the Democratic honcho who told

Robinson: "With Clinton, you literally go to bed every night worrying about what you're going to find out about him when you pick up the next day's paper. What we don't know is truly frightening."

The quote is anonymous, of course. Obviously the man doesn't want to blow a job in the Clinton administration should the flawed candidate somehow win this thing.

The quote speaks of everything that is wrong with the Democrats. Mr. Anonymous Source and the rest of the party heavies should have had Clinton's number long before 1992. After all, the guy has been running for the presidency since he was 3.

Aren't party heavies supposed to manage? Isn't it their job to see that the people with promise get support and that the people who smell like a tub of rancid butter get a one-way ticket back to Little Rock? (No offense meant to Little Rock.)

I don't care about Super Tuesday or how organized Clinton is in the South. Most of Florida stayed home last week. And most of Florida will not stay home in November.

I don't care if he did well in Illinois and Michigan Tuesday. The numbers have nothing to do with reality, and the reality is that America will not put Clinton in the White House.

It's not that he cheated on his wife and we're puritanical. Whatever he worked out with Hillary is their business. It's not that he ducked serving in Vietnam. Many people in that troubled time in America did the same. Not that this was fair to those who went, but so be it. That was 22 years ago.

But when we start hearing about a land deal with an officer in a failed S&L, and how Clinton wrote off $5,000 on his income tax that he wasn't entitled to, and how his wife's law firm got a load of business from the state — well, see you later, pal!

As the man who does my taxes put it, "You could shove bamboo sticks under Paul Tsongas' fingernails and he still wouldn't write off the $5,000."

Exactly. And I don't think Brown would either. And that's what America wants to vote for — honesty.

Don't you get it, Democrats? We're sick of operators who make all the right moves and come off all wrong. We're sick of people playing the angles and cutting corners and dropping us cold when we're no longer useful to them.

We've got Mr. Slick in the White House. You should be giving us his polar opposite, not the liberal version with a Southern accent.

Do something! You've got a shot this year. You've got Republicans waiting in line to vote for a Democrat they can live with. Don't throw it away.

Can't you find a nice smoke-filled room somewhere and plan to broker the convention? Give us Paul or Jerry or Mario or any dark horse of your choice. Anybody, anybody, but Bill!

If you let this alleged steamroller roll on, and if you nominate a person most of us can't stomach, you will lose a lot more than an election. And you'll deserve to lose it.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dear Editor,

As a student intern for the Student Activities Office this semester, I have learned a lot about the opportunities that are provided for all students. The Student Activities Office not only is the home of all registered organizations but also promotes activities involving all students and the UNCW community itself. During my internship I have seen: new organizations formed, the most successful Homecoming occur, The National Student Exchange program implemented, and the planning of the largest Welcome Week for all students and the community.

This has all been because of the Student Activities Office. These activities have benefited all students and the community. Unfortunately I have also learned through my experience that there are a lot of discrepancies in the decision process when implementing changes.

After reading The Seahawk article on March 12, 1992 about the Greeks being moved to Dean of Students Office from the Student Activities Office I have to comment openly my feelings.

I am a Greek member on this campus that does not want to see this change. This move will not be in the best benefit of students.

I feel the power that the Dean of Students holds will hamper our self-governing system. I also feel that the Student Activities Office is the appropriate home for Greeks. In this office the Greek leaders have learned to become the best leaders on campus and the most involved. This has been possible through delegation of more responsibility allowing our self-governing construction to increase.

I have been involved in the Greek system on this campus for three years and have watched it grow. The Greek/Non-Greek ratio has also increased on our campus. By separating the Greeks outside the Student Activities Office there may be a possibility of even more of a separation. This concerns me because it is important for all students to work together as leaders on this campus.

My greatest concern throughout this issue has been the process in which the administration made this decision. Why were the 1,000 Greek students not informed of the proposal that would affect them? This action has contradicted the claim that student opinions are valued by administration. Will this become a recurring process that will affect all 8,000 students?

I would hope that the administration will take this opportunity to reevaluate the significance of student opinions.

People In The News...

The royal rumor du jour is that Prince Andrew and Fergie, both 32, are talking separation after 5 years of marriage.

London's Daily Mail reports Wednesday that an announcement from the couple is in the works and that the queen's lawyer and others have huddled with the royals on "unpled legal issues."

Factoring into the tangle, no doubt, are the little Yorks, princesses Beatrice, 3, and Eugenie, who turns 2 Monday.

Asked about the r-port, the duchess's father, Maj. Ronald Ferguson, said, "I do not make any comment on my daughter's private matters."

Buckingham Palace, of course, was mum.

Mickey Rooney practically wore out a path on his eight trips down the aisle, but his biggest matrimonial regret is that he never married his frequent let's-put-on-a-show co-star, Judy Garland.

"There was no love greater in my life than my love for Judy Garland," the 71-year-old actor told Dick Cavett in a CNBC interview. "She was 'my girl' and in my heart, we belonged together." She died in 1969.

Carol Burnett, meanwhile, isn't getting many laughs out of trolling for love these days.

"Dating? It's the pits. It's really difficult, especially at this age," the 58-year-old star said Tuesday on ABC's "Good Morning America." Burnett, divorced from TV producer Joe Hamilton in the early '80s, says Mr. Right isn't necessarily an unfamiliar face.

She says she'd "love to find a fellow I've known for many years that's a buddy, and all of a sudden, he's free."

Grunge rocker Kurt Cobain of Nirvana admits that he's heavily under the influence of marital bliss, having quietly wed singer Courtney Love last month in Hawaii. "At times I even forget I'm in a band. I'm so blinded by love," Cobain, 24, tells Sassy magazine. "Now that I'm in love, I expect (my music) to be really happy." And what's not to be happy about? She's a bottle blonde, his hair's streaked pink, and they both wear dresses.

—REO Speedwagon singer Kevin Cronin, 40, plans to tie the knot next month, marrying Lisa Marie Wells, 29, director of music publishing at Geffen Records. The guest list for the Racine, Wis., wedding, includes Richard Marx and Eddie Money.

"He pictured us as being the Nebraska of L.A., but we provided him with a lot of good ammunition and like to take credit for his rise to fame." —Mayor Michael Hastings of Burbank, Calif., on a proposal to rename a city park for Johnny Carson.

"When I plant my garden, I'll don one of my outfits and do a weird dance to scare the crows off." —Doc Severinsen, on future uses for his flashy "Tonight Show" attire.

"One minute you're the hottest thing going, the next they don't know who you are. That's why I thank God I don't have just this to wake up to. I have a real life." —"Civil Wars" actress

Maricl Hemingway, on balancing show biz and married life. (She and restaurateur/writer/producer Stephen Crisman have two daughters, Dree, 4, and Langley, 2.)

"Asking any actor what he feels about any critic is like asking a lamppost about a dog."

—Joan Collins, on the mixed reviews she's getting on Broadway for "Private Lives," in People magazine.

"I think Jesus would have been a great basketball player. He would have been one of the most tenacious guys out there. I think he'd really get in your face — nothing dirty, but he'd play to win." —Utah Jazz center Mark Eaton, a born-again Christian.

"Pat Buchanan did best in Florida, where he barely campaigned. He did worst in Mississippi where he campaigned a lot. So, his new slogan is: Buchanan, vote for me and I'll shut the hell up and go home." —Johnny C. son.

Move

The renovation, which cost $500,000, was delayed when Recon Electrical construction filed for bankruptcy. "There were a number of items that needed adjusting and needed to be inspected," Jewell said.

Health and Wellness was slated to move on December 19 and was boxed up until the move. Jewell said that they were not able to give as many pap smears and contraceptive exams as they wanted to. "The conditions were less than ideal. We were very frustrated."

Jewell said that she hopes Health and Wellness will outgrow the space that they have now. "We have to keep up with the growth. In seven years we have gone from one or two rooms in Graham Hall to Burney Center to the new location."

FDA Restricts Seafood Sales

BY CAROL JOUZAITIS
Chicago Tribune

BALTIMORE — For 30 years Alexander Ondis has been a government seafood inspector in the heart of crab country along the Maryland and Virginia shores. Crabbing is a low-tech industry, and Ondis hasn't seen many changes in the dozens of waterfront plants that pack sweet white lumps of crabmeat for shipment to retail outlets.

"The process is really the same as it was generations ago," Ondis said. During the spring and summer, crabbers still ply Chesapeake Bay in small power boats, baiting long "trot" lines and throwing them overboard to catch blue crabs.

The crabs are taken ashore to packing plants, steamed in high-pressure cookers and left to cool overnight. In the morning, local women who learned the trade at their mothers' knees pick the meat from the shells by hand and put it into cans or jars.

While the operations haven't changed through the years, health-conscious consumers' appetite for seafood has. And though their consumption of fish rose 60 percent in the last decade, their confidence that it's safe has been withering due to recent reports of inadequate monitoring.

On average, for example, Food and Drug Administration inspectors visit each seafood plant only once every three or four years. The agency spends $40 million a year regulating seafood, less than 10 percent of the $450 million the U.S. Department of Agriculture spends to inspect meat and poultry.

The FDA, along with the states, regulates the nation's seafood processors and distributors to ensure that proper sanitation and handling procedures are followed.

FDA officials say they believe the seafood supply is wholesome and spending more money wouldn't increase safety enough to justify the cost.

But talking with the agency's seafood inspectors reveals shortcomings in the regulation process. For example, when the FDA last year ordered its most comprehensive survey ever of seafood plants, Ondis and his staff had to question local grocers and look through phone books to identify and find operators in their district, which consists of Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia and the District of Columbia.

The plants, which tend to be seasonal and run by individuals or families, aren't required to hold a federal license.

"Many are small and run on a shoestring. When the season's over, they may pick up and move to another part of the state. It's a difficult industry to keep track of," Ondis said.

The problem is a shortage of FDA resources, Ondis said. For example, the district's Salisbury, Md., office has only two investigators but is responsible for about 200 seafood plants, vegetable growers, blood banks and drug companies in Virginia and along Maryland's eastern shore.

Ondis said the survey has turned up "pockets of problems" in his district. Inspectors found evidence of the bacteria listeria, which can cause serious illness in humans, in "four or five" crab-packing plants, he said. Those plants recalled products from store shelves, and an investigation is pending into the source of the contamination.

"It's a constant challenge to educate packers about proper processing procedures," Ondis said.

Consumer groups are pushing for a more vigorous, mandatory government inspection program for seafood. One is Public Voice for Food and Health Policy, which says more than 80 percent of seafood eaten by U.S. consumers is never examined for dangerous bacteria, viruses or toxins.

Statistics don't show an upswing in seafood-borne illness, although Public Voice maintains that people typically don't report short-term illnesses such as nausea or vomiting. More worrisome to the FDA's critics is seafood contaminated by toxic metals, pesticides and other chemicals that could cause cancer or other illnesses in seafood lovers through long-term exposure.

Under heavy criticism, the FDA last year initiated a one-time program to visually survey all 4,000 U.S. seafood plants.

The nationwide program is intended to give the agency a more complete picture of industry conditions by covering everything from tiny oyster-shucking operations to big canneries.

With 3,541 inspections completed, the FDA found violations in 98 plants, or less than 3 percent, agency officials said. The problems included unsanitary conditions, contamination, inadequate refrigeration and mislabeling.

The FDA will issue a report of its findings in late April, along with recommendations on how to realign inspection resources to target problem areas better, said Thomas Billy, director of the FDA's Office of Seafood.

"We found very few plants with serious violations requiring immediate follow-up," Billy said. "It confirms overall conditions are pretty good."

Law Students Aid Refugees

BY HAROLD MAASS
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

MIAMI — Even the weather seemed strange to Elamant Girad as he hopped from one leg to the other, trying to keep warm Saturday night in front of a Biscayne Boulevard motel on the edge of Little Haiti.

Then there were the unfamiliar sounds of English and Spanish. And that was just the beginning of the confusion a day after he arrived in Miami from a Haitian-refugee camp at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"I have no idea what I'm supposed to do now," said Girad, 29.

The 5,700 Haitian refugees being allowed to apply for political asylum will have to weave through a maze of United States immigration laws to avoid being sent back. Overloaded refugee advocates turned to law students for help, and dozens of volunteers from Yale, Case Western Reserve and Harvard universities responded.

Several Yale law students staying in the motel next to Girad's said they jumped at the chance to spend their spring break working 10-hour days. Many believe immigration interviewers and Creole translators have done a poor job identifying political refugees. All wanted to help.

"We feel that the screening job they are doing is really arbitrary and completely unjust," said Tony Clawson, 24.

"The group that came in (Friday) night, they were really beaming, but it's frustrating. You wish there was an immigration process where they could just speak with their own voices."

Without the volunteer law students, many of the refugees might never receive all the legal help they need, said Cheryl Little, lead attorney at the Haitian Refugee Center.

"The United States Catholic Conference has one attorney. Catholic World Service has one attorney. We have three. There is no way we can do the kind of job we want to do here without some very serious help," Little said.

The Yale students said they saw refugees from countries all over the world applying for asylum with the help of the school's immigration clinic. No one had worse luck winning their claims than the Haitians, the students said.

The U.S. government has sent back nearly two-thirds of the 15,000-plus people who have fled Haiti since the Sept. 30 coup that forced President Jean-Bertrand Aristide into exile.

Some of the students said they believed so many Haitians were turned away because the country was so close to the United States and the U.S. government wanted to discourage other Haitians from coming. Some said the refugees were sent back because of flaws in the Immigration and Naturalization Service interview process.

"Some questions we had to ask more than once to get the actual answer," said Laura Ho, 23, who spent four hours Saturday talking to a refugee who had supported Aristide before the coup.

Clawson also conducted a painstaking interview Saturday, working with an interpreter, building trust and gradually piecing together one refugee's story. "It took us about an hour to find out his brother had been killed," she said.

Gerard Pierre, 19, said that during his stay at Guantanamo he watched fellow refugees leave their interviews feeling frustrated. They were sent back to Haiti, he said, unable or afraid to detail the dangers they would face at home.

"All you have to do is demand freedom, and they kill you. There are political problems everywhere in Haiti," he said. "I'm happy here. There are no gunshots ringing in my ears."

Being There When It Began

I can say I was there when the goings weren't so great.

The Lady Seahawks wrapped up their 1991-92 campaign last Thursday by bowing out of the Colonial Athletic Association tournament in the first round.

East Carolina's top seeded Lady Pirates defeated UNCW, for the third time this year, by the score of 74-61 at the Old Dominion University campus in Norfolk, Virginia.

The game was typical of the season. UNCW played even with ECU in the second half, both teams scored 34 points. ECU led by as much as 19 and by as few as nine in the final twenty minutes. Unfortunately, the score was 40-27 ECU at the half.

Sophomore guard Lorraine Cordaway scored 18 of her team high 20 in the second half but it wasn't enough. UNCW closed to within nine with 12:54 to go in the second half.

ECU's Connie Small then hit two long shots to push the lead back to double-digits and sealed UNCW's fate.

When this team wins 13 games next year and wins its first round game in the CAA tourney, I can say I was here for the beginning of the good ol' days.

I started covering the team on a full-time basis when I became the official scorekeeper at the beginning of January and saw them get blown out by UNC Greensboro 96-61 in my first game. From that game on the team occasionally showed sparks of brilliance.

At times the team was beat before it went on the court, and twice the team walked on the court with the mentality it was not going to lose.

One of those games was the win over Charleston Southern at Trask Coliseum. The other was the rematch against UNCW.

There was no way Charleston Southern was leaving Wilmington with a win. You could see it in the ladies' eyes.

That lone win was on February 20th. Sophomore Zandra Harris led the Lady Seahawks to a 89-57 victory by scoring 22 points and pulling down eight rebounds. Cordway also snared eight boards.

Probably the funniest aspect of the win was the team didn't know when to start celebrating. Freshman Joanna Chandler started whooping it up with about 45 seconds to go. UNCW was up by thirty. She probably could have started at the 45-second mark of the first half.

Senior Susan Kelly will be missed. Susan was a four-year walk-or player who played for the love of the game.

Though the team finished the year with a 1-26 record, 0-15 in the CAA, the balance of the team, coupled with a year's experience, could spell trouble for teams that underestimate the Lady Seahawks next year.

The leading scorer this year was Cordway. She averaged 14.6 points a game, and led the team in scoring 12 times. Cordway also had the team's highest scoring game with 30 in the Ivy Challenge against the University of Pennsylvania.

Harris followed that by leading the team in scoring eight times and finishing with a 11.9 points per game average. The third leading scorer was freshman Myra Horton (9.8), and sophomore Pat Martin was fourth with an 8.9 scoring clip. Sophomore Kim Bush finished fifth with a 4.8 ppg.

Four other Lady Seahawks led the team in scoring at least one time: Martin, Horton, Bush, and Amy Seagrove.

Harris led the team in rebounds by pulling down team-highs at both ends of the court. She pulled down 82 defensive and 73 offensive missed shots. Ten times Harris led the team in rebounds, most on the team.

Freshman center Hannah Grady snagged 5.1 a game. Martin (4.9), Horton (4.5), and Cordway (4.0) rounded out the top five.

Seven different players led the team in rebounds: at least once. Grady led the team six times. Horton five, Chandler and Martin three times each, and Bush, Seagrove, and Cordway once.

Couch Sheri Tynes will have nearly 80% of her offense and at least four starters back next year.

At the CAA tournament banquet last Wednesday, Myra Horton was named to the all-rookie team.

Next year's Lady Seahawk team will win its share of games and be a rising force in the CAA. Who knows, if this team gets hot, like the Atlanta Braves last year, they could go from last to first in a year.

I think it would be fun to take on a Chapel Hill or NCSU in the first round of the NCAA tourney.

It could happen, and I'm going to be there when it does.

Seahawks Upend Monarchs Twice

BY JIM CLARK
 Assistant Sports Editor

Coach Mark Scal's baseball team opened up Colonial Athletic Association play last weekend by taking two of three from preseason conference favorite Old Dominion.

In three close, well-played games, UNCW showed it will be a team to contend with in the CAA. The Seahawks (2-1, 8-14) finish out an eleven-game homestand today against the Le Moyne Dolphins from Syracuse, NY, at 3 p.m.

UNCW used strong pitching from sophomore Brian Smith and junior Jim Fritz and timely hitting to sweep Saturday's doubleheader 7-2 and 3-1.

In the opener, UNCW jumped ODU starter Stephen Lyons (3-2) for five runs in the first two innings and cruised on the arm of Smith the rest of the way. Smith (1-3) gave up only six hits and two walks, and struck out five in going the distance for his first win of the season.

Senior Mark Chamberlain led the way for the Seahawks with two hits, two RBIs, and a run scored. Freshman David McDowell and junior Darren McCain also had two hits apiece.

Game two saw Fritz two-hit the Monarchs in what he called his "best performance since coming to UNCW. I found I was pitching defensively so I threw a lot more fastballs today."

McDowell delivered the game winning hit in the bottom of the sixth off ODU stopper Wayne Gomes. Gomes, a first-time Freshman All-American last year, threw two hard sliders that missed before McDowell lined a single to center to drive in senior Perry Currin.

In Sunday's game, the long ball hurt UNCW. Junior Heath Altman, coming off a slight shoulder injury, pitched well for four innings before tiring. Before a reliever could warm up, ODU's Chris Everett hit a solo homer and T.J. O'Donnell hit a two-run shot over the left field fence. Altman (1-2) took the loss. ODU won 3-1.

Sophomore John "Snake" Babson pitched four innings of strong relief. Babson kept UNCW close, but the team couldn't muster the hits, as they had Saturday.

Scal is pleased with his team's progress this year but knows there is room for improvement. "I'd like to see (opponent's) on-base percentage lower," Scal said. Scal is pleased with his pitching staff. "We've had several surprises. Jeff Rogers, Brian Baucum, and Heath Altman have come in and done a pretty good job each time out. We've played enough games and the pitchers know if they stay consistently in the strike zone, the defense will take care of the rest."

Scal is looking for good things the rest of the way, with most of the emphasis going on the conference games. The top seed gets a first round bye in the tournament.

UNCW plays at William and Mary this weekend.

Seahawk Keith Bernhardt dives back to first base Tuesday in the first game of a doubleheader at Brooks Field. UNCW (8-14) lost both contests, 5-0 and 2-1.

Sports Briefs. . . Fish Going To Japan

Senior center Matt Fish verbally committed to one-year contract with the Toshiba professional club in the Japanese Basketball League Monday.

The 6-foot-10 inch player still has dreams of playing in the National Basketball Association but stated the opportunity in Japan was too good to pass up.

Fish was picked by former UNCW great Danny Davis (81) who played six years in Europe and four in Japan before retiring because of hip injuries.

Fish will participate in the Portsmouth Invitational Tournament April 8-11 in Portsmouth, Va. The tournament is known as a potential NBA recruiting ground and is attended by professional scouts.

Trekkers Split

The men's and women's track team, competing in all field events for the first time, split dual meets Saturday at the Fourth Annual Seahawk Track and Field Meet on the Harold Green Track. Eighteen other squads competed but not in head to head action with UNCW.

The men's squad defeated both UNCC (54-26)

The men's squad defeated both UNCC (54-26) and The Citadel (83-79). The Lady Seahawks fell to East Carolina (56-49) and UNCC (54-46).

Top finishers for UNCW were as follows:
 Men: 1,500 (Sam Bobbitt, 3,357.96), Hammer throw (James Jacobs, 1,152.7), Discus (Jacobs, 2,43.34), High Jump (Eric Young, 2,6-8), Shotput (Kenneth Aldrick, 2,13.172), Woom-n Hammer (Sissy Baker, 1,103-6), Discus (Baker, 3,29.68), High Jump (Carmon McLamb, 2,5-2), Javelin (Baker, 3,29.78)

Camel Attacked

The men's and women's tennis teams suffered losses Monday to in-state rival Campbell.

The men (6-1) suffered their first loss of the season to the 10-southern ranked Campbell, 6-3, picking up wins in no. 1 singles and doubles.

UNCW number one player, German Alvarez (6-1) upset the 22-ranked player in the south, Lazzio Vago, 5-7, 6-3, 6-2.

Double team, Chris Cagle and Mike Rayos (4-0), remain undefeated on the year.

The women's team (5-4) fell 6-3 to the Camels.

Seahawks Kary Symons (5-3) and Clare McQuillan (5-2) won in 5 : 14 6 singles. Joanne Putz and Wendy Krisel (1-0) captured win in 3 doubles.

'Hawks Go 2-3

The Lady Seahawks softball team, hosting a ten-team tournament, went 2-3 over the weekend at the Lady Seahawks Softball Invitational at Brooks Field.

UNCW, placed in the green pool, won their first two contests Friday morning, 15-5 over Shaw University and 2-0 against George Mason. The afternoon games, however, weren't as kind.

The Seahawks lost to Dayton (10-2) and Radford (9-5) and entered the first round with a .500 record. UNCW was eliminated early by Charleston Southern 4-3.

Lacrosse Lost

The UNCW Lacrosse team lost its inaugural match, 14-9, to N.C. State on Brooks Field Saturday.

Winner Unclear SGA Disqualifies Mitchell In Runoff

BY CAROLE MEHLE
News Editor

Joe Mitchell, Student Government Association candidate for student body president, was disqualified from the runoff election when a complaint was filed with the Election Board of SGA alleging that Mitchell had broken a campaign rule. The complaint was filed by Senator Ivy Chalmers. "I'm not sorry that I filed the charges," she said. Chalmers refused to give details on the charges.

Mitchell received 207 votes in the election to incumbent student body president Curtis Wilson's 197 votes.

The rule stated that no campaigning could be done in the SGA office. Mitchell said the complaint stated that he was campaigning in the office, before the polls were closed on the day of the runoff election.

"That is not true. I was outside the office when that occurred. That was disregarded by the Election Board," Mitchell said.

Mitchell said Chalmers has a motive for filing a complaint. "[Chalmers] doesn't want me to be president," he said.

Mitchell said he was notified Monday night that he had to meet with the Election Board because a complaint against him had been filed. He explained his side but was disqualified, he said.

"They are basing this on what one person said," he said.

Mitchell said that Chalmers "feels betrayed" because he didn't support her campaign to be elected for student services coordinator.

Mitchell also said that the rules of the Election Board are "meaningless and contradictory."

The charges against Mitchell were investigated by the Election Board. Mitchell criticized the investigation. "The charges were not properly investigated," he said. "That was unfair."

Chalmers also said "Everything is out of control. Judiciary procedures haven't followed."

Mitchell called the charges against him "trumped up."

"There is a conspiracy. I was elected fair and square twice."

Mitchell

Barry Graham, currently vice president, said Mitchell is trying to "grasp at straws. There is no conspiracy whatsoever."

Graham said the issue involves the ethics of the president. Graham asked, "Do you want a person as president who cannot adhere to rules?"

Graham said that the rules allow for one campaign violation to be excused with a warning and the second violation would result in disqualification. Graham said, "The Election Board gives the candidates rules to adhere to and he knew those rules. So why would he break them?"

Mitchell was charged earlier in the campaign with posting a flier over an opponent's flier and received a warning. Mitchell said that both of the charges made against him were by people "with conflicts of interest."

"They [SGA] are trying to keep the person that was elected out with trumped charges. This is a last ditch effort to keep a person they don't want in the office out. They are mad that I won."

"This means that students can charge a candidate with bogus charges and that candidate can be disqualified," he said.

Mitchell said SGA members "know things will change" if he becomes president. "They are going to have to shape up and serve students and work for students. That is the last thing some students want."

"The final decision will be made by the Election Board and I will stand by that decision," Graham said. "The bottom line is if all the allegations are true; if what happened was unethical; he shouldn't be president. If the charges are false and he won in an ethical way, then he should be president," he said.

"[Mitchell] is in a position that he is on thin ice. He feels he won the office but the rules are there," Graham added.

Mitchell filed an appeal Wednesday with the Election Board regarding his disqualification. "All the charges are false. They [the Election Board] can't prove them," he said.

Mitchell said that he has witnesses to back up his side of the story. The board took the word of one person as law, Mitchell said.

Mitchell said that the presidency is a "dream of mine for three years. I busted my butt working for the students and I got elected. I'm going to do all I can."

If Mitchell's appeal is denied, Wilson will remain in office for the next year. If not, Mitchell will be student body president next year.

Environment Studied Atlantis May Stay In Space Longer

BY SHIRISH DATE
Orlando Sentinel

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — With their goal of getting there achieved, space shuttle Atlantis' seven crew members Tuesday started a task nearly as dear to astronauts' hearts — finding ways to spend an extra day in space.

A ninth day for Atlantis' atmospheric research flight has long been a possibility, but the odds went up considerably with the 8:13 a.m. liftoff.

Had it remained on the pad because of weather or a late technical problem, Atlantis probably would have drained its electrical supply to the point where an extra day would have been impossible.

Instead, the space plane soared into a lazy sky only 13 minutes behind schedule. Low clouds over Kennedy Space Center's runway — where Atlantis would have landed in case of an emergency return to Cape Canaveral — briefly held up the countdown.

Once in space, engineers found that Atlantis was traveling about 4 mph slower than its planned 17,500-mph orbital speed. Three hours into the flight, an engine firing of 14 seconds corrected the problem and put Atlantis into a 184-mile circular orbit.

Apart from that, the liftoff went so smoothly that launch director Bob Sieck joked afterward it was almost a shame because launch engineers couldn't learn much from it.

"It really had no training value because there were no problems to work," Sieck said.

The launch, originally set for Monday morning, was canceled because of unusually large oxygen and hydrogen leaks as technicians began pumping the super-cold liquid fuels into the shuttle's external tank.

Sieck said such leaks previously have occurred and are caused by a Teflon seal between the shuttle and the tank that leaks until surrounding plates cool to a uniform temperature. Monday's leaks, twice as large as any in the Greenhouse effect theory

- Changing atmosphere: Man's burning of fossil fuel, such as coal, gasoline and other forms of petroleum, is adding more carbon dioxide and other gases to the atmosphere. The amount of these gases may be more than can be naturally absorbed by Earth's forests and other plant life. Widespread clearing of forests has decreased nature's ability to recycle carbon dioxide.
- Radiation entrapment: The increased carbon dioxide acts like the glass panes of a greenhouse, trapping the Sun's infrared radiation, which heats the air. As the carbon dioxide increases, higher worldwide average temperatures result.

- Water vapor effects: Water vapor enhances entrapment of greenhouse gases. A new University of Chicago study has found evidence that this does occur in nature.
- Altered climate: Scientists fear that global atmospheric warming will raise sea levels, change wind patterns and ocean currents, alter precipitation trends and increase the frequency of extreme weather events.

- Possible long-term effects: These changes could flood coastal areas, reduce availability of water for irrigation, cut crop yields, increase peak electric power demand and damage human health.

Election Clinton Faces Doubts

BY ROBERT S. BOYD AND KATHARINE SEELYE
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

WASHINGTON — Only days after Bill Clinton seemed to have the Democratic presidential nomination in hand, he suddenly faces two weeks in which he has to overcome persistent doubts about his character and electability.

If he does as poorly in delegate-rich New York on April 7 as he did in Connecticut on Tuesday, his candidacy could begin to unravel.

"New Yorkers are perverse," said Ted Van Dyk, a veteran Democratic strategist. "The next two weeks are likely to be the most poisonous in political history."

The defeat of Clinton, the governor of Arkansas, in the Connecticut primary means that Democrats are not ready to declare the nomination contest over, as the media and many political leaders did last week.

"This was a keep-it-open vote," said Ann Lewis, former political director of the Democratic National Committee. "People don't like being taken for granted or told who their nominee will be."

Clinton's twin victories in Illinois and Michigan on March 17, followed by the unexpected withdrawal of former Sen. Paul E. Tsongas, had seemed to clear the last major obstacles from Clinton's path to the nomination. But Connecticut voters had other ideas.

"The vote shows a general disquietude about Clinton — partly because he is still little known, partly because of his character problems," said Van Dyk, an adviser to Tsongas.

"People desperately want someone of size and substance. They don't see it yet in Clinton," he added.

The majority who voted for Tsongas or former California Gov. Jerry Brown in Connecticut were not necessarily rejecting Clinton forever. Some Democrats leaving the polls Tuesday said they would vote for him over President Bush in November if he wins the nomination.

And even though a solid majority of Democrats said they wished someone else were in the race, there was no evidence that they wanted a brokered convention, where party bosses would team to a Washington insider like House Majority Leader

Minors Ready For Registration

BY JENNIFER WILSON
Staff Writer

Pre-registration is here again and some students are still confused about the new minors, like Gerontology, being offered at UNCW.

Dr. Eleanor Maxwell coordinates the gerontology minor, which deals with the study of old age. "All students need to do is tell their advisors that they want to start taking courses in a minor in the fall," she said.

Dr. Dargan Frierson, assistant dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said that all five minors at UNCW have been officially approved for the academic year. Gerontology and Science and the Humanities and Society are two inter-disciplinary minors. The three others—Chemistry, political science and anthropology are more traditional.

"We anticipate that other departments will soon approve minors," Frierson said.

Maxwell explains that taking a minor does not necessarily mean setting yourself up for a huge course load. "You can do the gerontology minor in a year," she said.

There are only four required courses for the gerontology minor: Introduction to Gerontology; Health and Aging; Psychology of Adulthood and Aging and Sociology of Aging. Two of these will be offered in the fall, the other two will be offered in the spring.

Nine hours of electives will also have to be taken to earn a minor in Gerontology. These electives can be from a variety of courses such as the Literature of Society and Aging, Sociology of Birth and Death and Therapeutic Recreation for the Aging. At least six of the electives will be offered in the Fall.

Gerontology is an interdisciplinary minor in which students can study in many areas. The departments of Philosophy and Religion, Psychology, Health and Recreation, Social Work, Education, Sociology and English all have courses that count toward this minor.

Maxwell said that a student can use a minor to specialize in a certain area or just to study a completely different area than their major. "It's worth on a resume depends on how the student uses it."

"It [the minor] is one more thing on your transcript that makes you look like a specialist, not a generalist. It makes you look more rounded," she said.

"A chemistry minor taken by a biology major is a good way to beef up on sciences and can be very rewarding. A gerontology minor can be helpful to get a job with dealing with the aged."

"Minors were only considered electives before. Now they are documented on student transcripts."

Habitat For Humanity Builds A Following

BY LAURA KEETER
Staff Writer

When Pat Kalemba was an undergraduate student at N.C. State, he didn't like to get involved.

"I know I went through four years of school before I got involved with anything other than fun," he said. But now, as president of the UNCW chapter of Habitat for Humanity, Kalemba said he can't believe he wasted so much time.

"It's very touching to see a person break down and cry because they've always dreamed of owning a house," he said.

The students and faculty at UNCW involved with Habitat for Humanity work on certain Saturday mornings to build houses for people who couldn't otherwise afford one.

"I didn't know anything about construction. All I'd ever built was a tree fort," Kalemba said. "More girls than guys work. All you need is a desire. Professionals read the blueprints, measure and cut things. The rest of us just bang it together."

The next project scheduled for Habitat for Humanity is April 4 at 9 a.m., 612 Meares Street. Interested students just need to show up.

Chancellor James Leutze, who Kalemba called Habitat for Humanity's "number one supporter", participated in the group's dunking booth fundraiser last fall and worked on the last house project.

Faculty advisor Dr. Frank Ainsley from earth sciences said that people who are on the list to get a house built work about 75 hours building their house and the houses of others. "Their labor goes into paying for a part of their house," he said as "sweat equity."

The Cape Fear affiliate buys the house property, which is called "dollar lots." These pieces of land within the city are not of high value and are sold to Habitat for Humanity for $1.

Habitat for Humanity builds a house for $25,000 and the family buys it in $200 house payments over a 20-year, interest-free mortgage. Families who are accustomed to paying $300 to $400 rent can now afford to buy clothes as they pay for their three bedroom, one bath, kitchen, living room and dining room house.

"The rewarding part is when you meet these families. They're no different from you or I, they just haven't had the opportunity we've had," Kalemba said.

Club meetings are every other Thursday at 7:30 p.m. in Friday Hall, room 232. The next meeting is tonight.

Clinton

Richard A. Gephardt of Missouri or Sen. Lloyd Bentsen of Texas. Gephardt and Bentsen, the 1988 vice presidential candidate, are the most commonly mentioned fallback candidates.

"Voters are not saying, 'Give me someone who has spent more time in Washington.' Oh no!" Lewis said.

"This was a vote to give the establishment a kick in the pants. It has less to do with Clinton than with voters' sense that they were being cheated out of the process," she said.

Jimmy Carter, the last Democrat to win the White House, ran into similar problems in 1976, when Brown, then governor of the nation's biggest state, beat him in three late primaries, including California.

"Carter basically had the nomination wrapped up," said Milton Gwirtzman, a Democratic lawyer active in the campaigns of the 1970s. "People resented the fact that they are not being considered, so they decided to send a message."

Clinton could take heart from the fact that Connecticut never figured to be a strong state for him. His appeal is generally to downscale voters, and Connecticut is an upscale state. Clinton virtually wrote it off to Tsongas.

As a result, when Tsongas dropped out, his supporters were stranded. Since Clinton didn't appeal to them, they could either vote for Brown or stick by their departed candidate. A surprising 1 in 5 voted for Tsongas.

Mark Metlman, a Democratic pollster, shrugged off the results as a protest vote. "Jerry Brown will not be the nominee," he said. "It's not going to happen."

At the moment, Clinton is so far ahead of Brown in the delegate count that even if he loses the next string of states—assuming his losses aren't crushing—he can still win enough delegates to put him over the top before the July nominating convention.

But more than arithmetic is involved. "If Jerry Brown wins New York, Clinton has big problems, and there will be a big effort to prevent [Clinton] from getting the nomination," said William Schneider, an analyst with the American Enterprise Institute.

After April 7, the campaign moves to the West, Brown's home base. Clinton fared badly in the Washington state Democratic caucuses last month, and a new California poll indicates that he is running neck and neck with Brown in that state, which holds its primary on June 2.

That opens up the possibility, remote but not totally out of the question, that Democrats would find themselves this summer facing this nightmare scenario: Clinton unable to persuade a majority of primary voters to support him, Brown seen as a spoiler whom party leaders could not stomach, congressional Democrats in mortal fear of rejection by disgruntled voters and panicked at the thought of a weak candidate at the top of their ticket.

It was just that possibility that led Tsongas to suspend, rather than abandon, his presidential campaign last Thursday and to keep himself on standby—just in case.

Shuttle

past 45 shuttle flights, convinced engineers to postpone the launch to take a closer look.

That included a review of seal inspections as the shuttle moved through pre-launch processing. Sieck derided that the leak would not keep Atlantis from launching safely.

Ironically, Monday's scrub probably kept alive the possibility of an extension of the planned eight-day flight. Because Monday's poor weather would have prevented a liftoff anyway, Atlantis would have wasted precious electricity had the leak not canceled the launch at about 2:40 a.m., before the ship switched to internal power late in the countdown.

Scientists using the 13 instruments in Atlantis' cargo bay to study the sun and its interaction with Earth's atmosphere are hoping for an additional day to increase the amount of data.

Innocence Should Be The Only Issue

As SGA presidential candidate Joe Mitchell appeals to the SGA Election Board and to the student body of UNCW, he should stick to one issue — proving his innocence.

Mitchell has claimed that he is innocent, and that the charges against him were fabricated. But he has also placed great emphasis in making his appeal on the runoff vote which put him ten votes ahead of his opponent, current president Curtis Wilson.

Mitchell has said that he deserves to be in office because he won the election. In fact, he said that he won twice, referring to the fact that he got the most votes in the general election last week.

Actually, Mitchell did not win either election. The election rules state that to avoid a runoff, a candidate must get 51 percent of the votes in the general election. Mitchell did not do this. The votes for student body president were divided among three candidates, none of whom won more than 50 percent.

In the case of the runoff election, Mitchell was disqualified for violating campaign rules. Mitchell can claim that, because he had more votes than Wilson in the runoff election, the student body of UNCW wants him as president. However, his voter total cannot serve as his defense to the charges of campaign violations. There is one simple reason why.

The students who voted for Mitchell were not aware of the alleged campaign violations at the time of the election.

Had the alleged violations occurred before election day, and had the charges been made public before the election, Mitchell might very well have lost.

After all, it wouldn't have taken a mass abandonment by his supporters for him to lose. His margin of victory was only ten votes. It is quite plausible that campaign violations would change the minds of ten voters.

This is not to say that Mitchell deserved to be disqualified. In fact, it is nearly impossible to determine his innocence or guilt without knowing the results of the Election Board investigation. There is evidence on either side.

Ivy Chalmers, who filed the charges, might have had a predisposition against Mitchell. Just last week she lost the race for SGA student services coordinator to Mitchell's roommate, Rob Oliver, whom Mitchell supported. And ironically, Chalmers herself said of the investigation, "Everything is out of control. . . . Judiciary procedures haven't been followed."

Clearly, important questions remain to be answered. But one thing is clear, if Mitchell's appeal is successful, his path to office has been a rough one.

Stillpoint with Bob Haywood Recollection Will Help Achieve Peace

"And all the King's horses and all the King's men couldn't put Humpty Dumpty together again." Ever have "Humpty Dumpty" days when you feel all in pieces and scattered all over the landscape?

There are so many parts of my life: a responsible professional, the home fixer-upper, the finder of my wife's lost things, the runner, and the doer. There are days when all of those parts feel disconnected and I am just bouncing from one to the other without any sense of cohesiveness or control.

There is a spiritual discipline that we would do well to cultivate in our lives, one that is not spoken much about. It is called "recollection." In its simplest form it is a time to re-collect ourselves in the presence of God.
